The Greater GIMBEL STORE Is Ready NOW

Many Important Departments DOUBLED in Size

The Great Christmas Throngs Will Find Room for Comfortable and Comparatively Leisurely Shopping

ONE of the greatest expansion programs in the history of American retailing is NOW practically completed. As this advertisement is written much remains to be done. By the time it appears in print that much will have been done. The fundamental and essential part of the great move will have been accomplished. The finer points will be taken care of after the holidays.

IT was a daring thing to do—the peremptory and almost ruthless uprooting of many of the store's greatest and most bulky sections at the very height of the winter season. There was no precedent of the procedure. The weight of evidence was against its advisability. There was doubt as to its possibility.

WHAT it was possible has been demonstrated by the fact that the great task has been accomplished. Not without some inconvenience to the public. Not without a great task on our own organization. And, incidentally, not without a magnificent response on the part of every member of the store family to the call for added effort.

ALL of which things may be forgotten in face of the great fact that the wonderful big store is magnificently ready now for the great Christmas throngs. Ready to serve, easily and comfortably, half as many people again as a year ago. Comfortably we say, and we mean that. Without the usual crush, jostle and general commotion of other years.

MANY sections are in locations far removed from where you have learned to look for them. This might cause confusion had we not prepared new location directories advising of the changes. Every employee has one of these directories. You will find them at each information booth. The elevator operators will direct you quickly—and correctly.

YOU will find many new features other than the rearrangement of sections that will simplify your shopping problem. High speed elevators have been installed to whisk you upward at twice the former speed and with all possible safety. 36 passenger elevators in the main Gimbel store alone; a largely augmented selling force; a large fleet of delivery trucks, etc., etc., etc.

ON the right you will find a schedule of some of the more important changes in the store's layout. Enough to show you what a wonderful affair the NEW store is.

The Gimbel Linen Shop Is Now Twice Its Former Size

Come see the throng of exquisite gift-things you'll find there. Glorious damasks; beautiful Madeiras; superb linens from everywhere that good linens can came. And twice the room to choose.
—Second Floor

Blankets : Comforts : Auto Robes Sheets : Twice the Former Space

All of them displayed and arranged so as to make a fine section a finer section still. Countless suggestions for gifts of splendid practicality. A revelation. Come tomorrow and see.
—Second Floor

Women's and Misses' Apparel Now Occupies 80,000 Square Feet

Superb furs. Newest Paris imports in frocks and coats for every occasion of the holiday season ahead. And for gifts.
—Third Floor

One Entire Floor (80,000 Sq. Ft.) Now Devoted to Boys', Girls' and Junior Wear

Suits; coats; frocks; hats for Young New York. Ready in a greater shopping space where this sort of gift-buying should of necessity be. A myriad gift-thoughts. To exhaust the Juvenile list.
—Fifth Floor

Pianos; phonographs; radios; musical instruments. Two whole floors of them for music lovers' gifts. Come where music is—for Christmas-time—in the auxiliary Gimbel Building—120 West 32nd Street—just across the street from the Gimbel Main Store.

Art Needlework Now in a Greatly Enlarged Section on the Second Floor

Ready with all the feminine loveliness that women so much prize. Silks and laces fashioning trifles of major importance. Inspect them and select them. For Gifts.
—Second Floor

Intimate Apparel for Women Now in Greatly Enlarged Sections

Shop for them unhurriedly. Plenty of space to choose. Christmas lingerie; aprons; house-dresses in almost inexhaustible variety. The kind you will give. For gifts.
—Fourth Floor

The New Daylight Restaurant Is on the New Eleventh Floor

How much, after arduous Christmas shopping, your will enjoy its daylight; its service; its space! Same modest prices. Same quality food.
—Eleventh Floor

Furniture Will Eventually Occupy the Ninth and Tenth Floors

It is now admirably situated and finely arranged on the Tenth. Where now you may see—and buy—furniture of high calibre and character. For gifts.
—Tenth Floor

The Toy Store—Now on the Sixth—Is the Largest Toy Store in New York

And its fame has gone far already. Establishing definitely that Gimbels is the place for toys. A paradise alike for young folks and older folks. And a mecca. Of gifts.
—Sixth Floor

The Gimbel Silk Store Is Now Twice Its Former Size

Silks from every great silk mart. Dress patterns; blouse-lengths. In every most wanted weave. Buy them now in the greatest Gimbel Silk Shop—for gifts.
—Second Floor

The New Kiddies Shop Will Be the Largest in America

Everything shining. Everything brand new. And, under shopping conditions such as never has it been possible to achieve before, for babies and tots a wealth of wearables, toys, furniture, accessories. Easiest choosing for loveliest Christmas Gifts.
—Fifth Floor

Greatly Enlarged Facilities for Most of the Store's Most Important Sections

Equipment; accessories are beautifully new. So that when you think of Christmas shopping, you will shop at Gimbels—the newer and greater Gimbel New York store.

FUND PUTS SUNSHINE INTO NEEDY HOMES

Aid for Unfortunate Families Keeps Pace With the Daily Contributions.

ANOTHER $1,000 GIFT COMES

Mrs. Wm. K. Kalman Among the Large Donors—Guy A. Loomis Cables $500.

TOTAL IN HAND NOW $66,181

Early Help Is Asked to Lift the Burdens From Distressed Families Before Christmas.

Contributions of $8,398.75 increased the total for the neediest cases yesterday to $66,181.49. Hundreds of cases are still in need of help. The present total is only a little more than a quarter of last year's figure of $250,000, which provided for 345 cases. It is hoped this year to relieve a still greater number of cases.

The largest contribution yesterday was one of $1,000, sent by Mrs. William Kahn Kalman, who writes:

New York City, Dec. 10.

Hundred Neediest Cases:

It gives me great pleasure to again contribute to that worthy charity, "The Hundred Neediest Cases," and I am herewith enclosing a check for $1,000, which you may distribute wherever it will do the most good.

The simple way in which you present the cases goes straight to the heart, and I hope that not only will you reach in amount the goal you have set for yourself this year, but attract many new contributors, so that you will exceed it by far. With best wishes, I am,

Yours very sincerely,
IRMINE KEHRS KALLMAN.

Cables Order for Gift.

A contribution of $500 was made by Guy A. Loomis, head of G. A. Loomis & Co., 45 Broadway. He is abroad, but he cabled to his representatives here to give $500 to the neediest cases in his name.

Other large contributions were Mrs. [illegible] E. Wilson, $400; "Jedediah [illegible]," $300; Mr. and Mrs. J. K. Newman, $250; Virginia Butler, $150; W. [illegible]stadt, $250.

Among the contributors of $100 were William Fellowes Morgan, Colonel J. [illegible] Benjamin of the Schenectady General Reserve Depot, John J. Pulleyn, president of the Emigrant Industrial Savings Bank; Mr. and Mrs. Clarence Lee, Caroline L. Morgan, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur E. Levy, Margaret Stewart, Mr. and Mrs. J. P. Blair, Mrs. G. M. Sargent, E. D. Bessen and Arthur Meyer.

Forty-five contributions were made yesterday in memory of dear ones.

"I am an old man in my ninetieth year," wrote one contributor. "I send it in memory of my son, Louis Levy, to help others. Excuse my writing. My hand shakes."

One of the contributions was in memory of Barney Bernard, the comedian. Among the letters accompanying contributions was the following:

Technical High School, Scranton, Pa.
Dec. 10, 1926.

Hundred Neediest Cases:

Once again I wish to thank you for the privilege you afford me of giving to the nation's most worthy Christmas fund. In all America I feel there is no single effort to alleviate pain or to assuage grief which compares with the Hundred Neediest Cases.

I consider the list an honor roll and wish that I were possessed of enough of the world's goods to occupy a place on it such as Abou Ben Adhem on a similar one.

Yours most sincerely,
MICHAEL J. COSTELLO,
Vice Principal.

Young Explorer Aids Fund.

David Binney Putnam, the 13-year-old explorer and author, sent a check for $25 with the following letter:

Hundred Neediest Cases:

Dad showed me about the hard luck of Davy, your Case No. 1. Well, I've been most awfully lucky this year and so I want to send Davy a little present. Please use for him my check for $25.

Sincerely,
DAVID BINNEY PUTNAM.

Checks should be payable to "The Hundred Neediest Cases Fund" and sent to THE NEW YORK TIMES or to one of the six charitable organizations. Contributors may specify a particular case, or a particular society to receive the money, otherwise it is placed in the general fund for the neediest cases. Each check sent for a specific case goes to the society sponsoring that case, with a notification of the use intended for it. Sometimes the contributions for a particular case exceed its needs. The excess is used for other needy families.

Contributions designated for a particular society are immediately forwarded to it. Where no specific instructions are given for the use of the money it is divided among the six societies. A check covering the day's receipts is sent to each society on the following day.

One of Many Sad Cases Calling for Assistance

CASE 8.—An Aged Mother and Daughter Come to Need, Yet Once They Could Give.

Mrs. Vogel was delighted to be visited by old friends. She would bring forward the two threadbare gilt chairs, relics of bygone prosperity. Although she is 97 years old, she is tall, quite erect and her mind is still keen. She lives with her daughter Martha, who is 62. The aged woman and her elderly daughter made a brave pretense that they were doing nicely, but the visitors could see that they were worried. They doubted if there was enough to eat in the house and they asked the society to investigate. It was found that they were, indeed, in fear of the poorhouse. At the end of a lifetime of hard work Martha's eyes were failing. She still sewed many hours a day, but could earn only a few dollars a week.

More than half a century ago they belonged to a well-to-do New York family. Mr. Vogel was a merchant, who died in 1875. The estate that he left was unexpectedly small, but it was safely invested. The income did not enable Mrs. Vogel and her daughters to live as they were accustomed. They listened to bad advice. "A friend of the family" persuaded them to reinvest in an enterprise which he described as safe and certain to yield large returns. Their whole fortune was swept away. A little later they received a second setback. Martha was to be married, but her fiancé died. Her hope chest of fine linens was sold to pay the bills. Since then she has had twoscore years of incessant toil. All they hope for now is enough help to keep them together while the mother lives.

Amounted needed, $800.

Case attested and administered free of cost by the Charity Organization Society, 105 East Twenty-second Street. (Telephone Gramercy 4068.)

care, trade training for children and occupational re-education for the blind and crippled.

Family's Privacy Respected.

The family is aided without any public exposure of its misfortunes. Its privacy is thoroughly respected. The actual names of the families are not even known to The Times. Only with the consent of the families is it possible for those who wish to give personal assistance, to visit them. This, of course, does not apply to children who are alone in the world. What the appeal does for them is to give them medical care and the proper kind of life and training, to build them up into healthy and attractive children. Nearly all of them are, sooner or later, adopted into good homes.

In the case of aged women and aged couples who have outlived all their relatives all that contributions can do is to keep them comfortable in their old homes, saving them from the sorrow of ending their days in a poor house, far from old companions and surroundings. In all other cases the ultimate aim is to help a family through its trials and to assist it in resuming the battle of life by its own efforts.

In cases where a widow has many small children to rear the day when the family can be self-sustaining is years distant. Others, with well-directed aid and encouragement, may regain their independence in a few months. The family's effort to make its own way is strongly supported. Everything is done, to win back the health of invalids and by special training of growing children and the partially disabled to develop the family's earning capacity.

Messages With Gifts.

The following are passages from the letters of contributors;

L. T. P., M. D.—Kindly credit the enclosed check "In memory of my beloved Anna." This is a most inspiring and beneficent work. Our profession responds and gladly, to many cases for "sweet charity's sake" all the year round, but little Raggedy Ann strongly appealed to me, as my own beloved Anna has "crossed over," and will joyously smile down upon me, as she was always so interested in this annual appeal. May the harvest be full and overflowing.

Arthur Lipper—I have read in your paper of the splendid work that you are doing to help the unfortunate and take great pleasure in enclosing herewith my check to the order of the Hundred Neediest Cases fund for $100 to further assist in this good work.

Mrs. Samuel M. Newburger—I enclose as my contribution to your fund, check for $100 in memory of my parents—Joel and Bertha Gutman. I am very glad to help in this worthy cause. I consider it one of the most meritorious and deserving of all charity movements.

Stephen W. Graydon, Summit, N. J.—Here is a dollar which I have saved since last year.

Ann Batchelder—Of all the charities with which the world is full, this one has the greatest appeal and should receive all the support you ask for it, each and every Christmas.

A Privilege to Help.

Mr. and Mrs. Milton S. Rodenberg—We are sending our contribution, of $100 to the Hundred Neediest Cases and feel it a privilege in thus helping to give the necessary immediate aid.

R. T. B.—Enclosed please find post-office order for $5 which I hope will help bring Christmas cheer to one of the needy cases.

Gertrude Ryder Smith—Enclosed please find my check for $5. I would like it applied to Case 38. It gives me pleasure to again be able to send another contribution to Case 66. The good work done in this connection deserves the highest commendation, and I feel privileged in being able to help, even in such a small way.

E. A. B.—I am glad to see that the fund has been growing so rapidly and trust that in this year of extraordinary prosperity for the country as a whole you may see the total reach a figure far in excess of that for any preceding year. I need not add that I feel that this work is one of the greatest things being done by any agency to help those in misfortune and to mitigate somewhat the pressure of present-day civilization upon the less fortunate ones near the bottom of the financial ladder.

Ruth Brown—Please accept this small contribution of $5 to the Hundred Neediest Cases to be used wherever you see fit. I know you are giving assistance only to those who are in dire need and worthy of and deserving your aid. This noble work should receive the support of the public at large, and it is gratifying to see the names of large numbers who are making substantial contributions to this worthy cause.

Children Answer Appeal.

Jerry and Elizabeth Greene, aged 3½ and 1½—This is my third contribution, and my little sister's second to the Hundred Neediest Cases. Please use this $5 for the poor little girl whose dog, though so thin and hungry, was so faithful to her. We have a dog which we love, too. We send our very best wishes for greater success than ever.

Oscar H. Banghart—I am enclosing check for $20, which I would be pleased to have you apply on Case 4 to help gladden the Christmas of this unfortunate family. If the fund for this case is complete, you may apply the amount to any other needy case. I am always glad to help this worthy charity and compliment you for your effort in behalf of the same.

Ruth and Virginia—Enclosed please find check for $5. This is a small gift from two little girls in Jersey who want their money to be sent to little Betty in Case 13. They hope her Christmas Day will be happy and they know their day will be happier because in giving up something for Betty they have found out the real spirit of Christmas.

Louise V. Brant—Enclosed please find check for $10 for the Hundred Neediest Cases. May the fund go over the top.

Edward Weidenbach—Enclosed please find check for $10 for the Hundred Neediest Cases Fund, my annual contribution to this noble charity.

Mary F. Knapp, Kingston—I am thankful to have the privilege of lending a helping hand, even though in so small a way as the enclosed check represents. It is offered in memory of M. D. R., a woman doctor, who "went about doing good."

Edna B. Stein—Enclosed find my check for $15, an increase over last year's contribution. Will you please apply it to Case 66, as that one appeals to me most, owing to the fact that my mother died two years ago with a heart affliction, too. "In memory of Ida W. Stein." I wish it to be listed.

Glad to Help the Cause.

Harvey A. Steinfeld—Every year I welcome the opportunity to help bring sunshine among your selected and most worthy Hundred Neediest Cases.

Benjamin E. Warfield—Permit me to add my small contribution to this great-hearted enterprise.

Anonymous—It gives me great pleasure to enclose check for $10 for the relief of Case 82. If it should be that this case is fully provided for, please apply my gift to Case 70, which seems almost as pathetic as Case 82.

John J. Pulleyn, President of the Emigrant Industrial Savings Bank—Enclosed herewith please find my check for $100 for one of the Neediest Cases reported by Catholic charities. May the response to your appeal be increased one hundred fold over those of 1925.

Mrs. Carolyn G. Whittemore—While thinking of the neediest cases, the enclosed verses came to me:

Oh, list to the call of the needy,
Surely you'll not turn a deaf ear
To those who are friendless and lonely,
And whose days are haunted with fear.

Out of the storehouse of plenty
Let us share with our brethren here;
We'll have no right to our Christmas
If we do not give them good cheer.

Remember the words of the Saviour
Before Whom we now bend the knee,
He who gives gladly to one of the least
Gives also a gift unto me.

Advertisement Does Its Bit.

Victor Morits, National Business Review—I enclose herewith two checks, one for $35, which you will find endorsed by James S. Anderson & Co. This check was given to us for an advertisement placed in our paper and during the conversation with the gentleman in question, he made a statement that he would give $35 to any charity in payment for the ad. We therefore thought it would be a good opportunity of placing in your hands this particular check for distribution. Our own check for $5 is to apply to the same fund. The salesman in question did not draw his commission on this account and we therefore give it in the name of Mr. Davis and Mr. De Baer. We trust this will alleviate some poor family and they will enjoy a merry Christmas.

Florence G. Bayne—I hope some sad, needy old woman may be made happier by this check.

H. B. D.—"Again the silent wheels of time their annual round have driven" and we are reminded of the splendid annual effort for the Neediest Cases Fund. The cases are all so pitiful I can hardly read them. I enclose my check for $10 and regret that it is so small. You may give it to Case 14, little six-year-old Helen, unless she is already provided for. Please list it in memory of M. B. L. with earnest wishes for the success of this beautiful charity.

Myra Ehrenfeld—Enclosed please find a check for $10 to be used for Case 3. This money is sent by the girls of the seventh grade of the Robert Louis Stevenson School, who have been interested in this case.

Mary E. Jenkins—Please apply enclosed check toward the relief of the two aged sisters mentioned in Case 79. Sorry I am not in a position to contribute a larger sum, but feel that I ought to do something to help ameliorate the condition of these stricken sisters.

The following contributions have been received, but were erroneously acknowledged in previous lists: Nanny W. Yuille, $100; Mrs. Charles H. May, $10; Karl Fix, Wallach, $10; H. O. Hernstadt, W. Their father is in a hospital; their mother cannot move her right hand; their grandmother, 65, is helpless from rheumatism. A Son Assumes the Place of His Stricken Father.

"Is that your son, Mr. Graves?" asked the sanatorium nurse of one of the patients who had just had a visitor. "What a fine looking boy!" "George is a fine boy," replied the sick man; "the finest boy you ever knew! We were going to send him to college, but, of course, there is no hope now • • •" His voice choked.

Mr. Graves was a printer. He had been a healthy, hard-working man. In his fiftieth year he learned that he was in a bad way with tuberculosis of both lungs. George, who was 16, had to leave school and find work as a clerk. The mother is afflicted with increasing deafness, which makes it impossible for her to take up any outside occupation. The father is improving very slowly. He may recover his health entirely in time, but they will be in great need for a year or two.

CASE 71.

A Father Flees, Leaving His Family of Five Destitute.

Bessie is 10, but is only in the first grade. When she was away from school for several days, the teacher asked about her. None of the other children knew what had happened and the teacher went to investigate. She had a good deal of trouble reaching the hut where Bessie lived. There were no streets near it, and finally she found it—a desolate spot near Jamaica Bay. The teacher learned that Bessie had to stay at home to look after Mary, 8, and Marian, 6, while their mother washed. Their father is a carpenter, but he has been out of work for a long time. He has gone to Florida, where he has relatives, in the hope that he can get work there. He has left his family destitute.

The mother is a frail woman who has been ill herself. She has had to pawn most of the family's clothing and bedding. Her husband has written that he will send money as soon as he can get it, but he has not done so. The mother has had to borrow money from neighbors to keep the family alive. Bessie's clothes are in rags. Her shoes are worn through. Mary and Marian have no shoes at all. Their mother has had to keep them in bed because they have no clothes to wear. The children's toys are made-over pieces of tin from a junk heap. Julia, 5, and Etta, 3, are so thin that every bone shows. Baby Mat is greatly undernourished. The mother is worn out by hard work at the factory, long walks going and coming, and long hours washing, ironing and doing other housework at night. She cannot carry the burden alone any longer.

Amount needed, $875.

RIGHTS AT CROSSING GIVEN TO WALKERS

Vehicles Must Yield to Them When Policemen or Signals Are Not in Control.

NEW TRAFFIC RULES OUT

Booklets for Drivers Will Be Ready After Dec. 21—Regulations Go Into Effect Jan. 1.

New traffic regulations, which become effective Jan. 1, were made public yesterday by Police Commissioner McLaughlin. The new regulations, the outcome of months of study of the problem of expediting travel through the city streets by the Police Traffic Board, of which Philip D. Hoyt is Chairman, have been printed in a booklet which drivers may obtain at any police station after Dec. 21.

Under provision of the City Charter Police Department traffic regulations have the effect of law and violations are subject to punishment as a misdemeanor. Some of the provisions of the new regulations amplify or extend sections of the State motor vehicle law, such as the paragraphs regarding lights; others, such as parking rules, have application to problems peculiar to New York City.

The regulations provide that pedestrians shall have the right of way at crossings where no policeman is present and traffic light control system is not in operation. Vehicles must slow down and stop, if necessary, to permit pedestrians to pass.

The regulations also forbid parking on main streets and avenues below Fifty-ninth Street during the business hours and continue the ban on the unnecessary blowing of automobile horns.

The full text of the new regulations follows:

DEFINITIONS

Curb—The lateral boundary of that portion of a street, designed for the use of vehicles, whether marked by curb stones, or not so marked.

Roadway—That portion of any street, bridge, parkway, tunnel, &c., which is included within the curbs or curb lines thereof, and is designed for the use of vehicles.

Vehicle—Every conveyance used for the transportation of persons or merchandise, including a draught or riding animal whether driven, ridden or led, except a baby carriage.

Street Car—Any conveyance confined to tracks.

Driver—The driver, rider or leader of a horse, and a person who pushes, draws, propels, operates or who is in charge of a vehicle.

Parking—The standing or waiting on any roadway of any vehicle not actually engaged in taking up or setting down passengers or merchandise.

Parking Space—That part of any roadway designated by competent authority as a place for the parking of vehicles.

Crossing—The extension of the sidewalk space across intersecting streets, whether marked by pavement or not so marked.

Area of Intersection—That area within side lines, real or projected, of two or more streets which meet or cross each other.

Safety Zone—That space designated by competent authority within a roadway for the protection of pedestrians.

OPERATION OF VEHICLES

Traffic Control by Police Officers.

a—A driver must at all times comply with any direction from a police officer by hand, voice, whistle or mechanical device, and a police officer in order to expedite traffic or safeguard pedestrians may disregard any traffic light signal or established regulation when in his opinion an emergency exists.

b—The following whistle signals by police officers are prescribed:
One Blast: Moving traffic shall stop.
Two Blasts: Cross traffic shall move.
Three or More Blasts (emergency): All moving traffic shall immediately stop.

Traffic Control by Light Signals.

a—Where a traffic light control system is in operation a driver must obey all signals therefrom as follows:
Green Light: All vehicles toward which it is directed may proceed.
Red Light: All vehicles toward which it is directed shall stop at the nearest crossing or white line indicating place of stop, and shall not again proceed until a green light is shown. An interval of several seconds is given between the red and green lights and vice versa to permit pedestrians who are crossing at the moment the lights change to reach the sidewalk in safety and to permit vehicles which have entered the area of intersection to pass beyond that area.

b—All vehicles approaching a street or avenue controlled by traffic signal lights shall come to a full stop back of the nearest crossing, unless such signal light directs them to proceed Such vehicles wishing to cross a light-controlled street or make a left turn shall wait until the light on such traffic light controlled thoroughfare is set to permit them to proceed. Such vehicles wishing to make a right turn may do so in conformity with Article II, Section 7a, after coming to a full stop.

3—Isolated Traffic Control Lights, which are not part of a continuous signal system, control traffic only at the crossings at which they are located.

Reckless Driving.

No person shall operate, drive or propel, and no owner thereof riding thereon or therein shall cause or permit to be operated, driven or propelled, on any street or bridge, any vehicle recklessly or negligently or at a speed or in such manner as to endanger or to be likely to endanger the life, limb or property of any person.

Reasonable Care.

Nothing contained in or omitted from this chapter shall be construed or held to relieve any person using, traveling, or being upon any street, for any purpose whatsoever, from

Move to Make Delhi Dry When Parliament Convenes

DELHI, British India, Dec. 11 (AP).—Delhi, India's new capital, is to be wet when Parliament convenes here for the first time in January. A movement already is on foot, however, to follow the example set by Australia's federal capital, Canberra, and bar the sale of liquor.

The question was discussed months ago by Parliamentarians in Calcutta. Many of them were in favor of Government supervision of leases and ground sales, so that there would be no saloons within certain distances of the new Parliament House. This building stands four miles south of the famous Kashmir Gate of the old Delhi, where the Great Mogul once sat on his peacock throne.

FORD WEEKLY REPLIES TO STRAUS SPEECH

Declares Challenge for Jury to Decide Facts Has Already Been Met.

Special to The New York Times.

DETROIT, Dec. 11.—A reply to the recent statement made by Oscar Straus of New York in a Boston speech that Henry Ford had been "misled into a campaign of slander against the Jewish people" will appear in the Dec. 25 issue of The Dearborn Independent, Mr. Ford's weekly. Advance proofs of the article have been given out at the Ford offices. It says in part:

"That the international Jew is in direct control of all financial centres of Government, including the United States Federal Reserve System.

"That he pulls so many strings in business that no banker or business man feels safe to oppose him.

"That he either owns the press or controls it so that only pro-Jewish facts are ever admitted to print.

"That he controls the revolutionary elements of the world, on one hand, and the ultraconservative elements on the other, so he has equal power in communistic Russia and in capitalistic England, not to mention the theatre, motion picture or agriculture.

"That the international Jew is the chief control, therefore, in the making of war, of which he is also the chief profiteer.

"The 'slander' consists of calling attention to the claims which the Jews have made for their pre-eminence in the world. These claims are largely true and have been made by responsible Jewish leaders. To repeat these for the benefit of other people cannot possibly be 'slander.'

"The international Jew is the most closely organized racial entity in the world, with an espionage system that covers every village and every larger centre in the country.

"These statements are deducible from the most deliberate utterances of Jewish spokesmen and illustrated at large by Jewish history. To agree with the Jewish claim to pre-eminence in these matters is no more 'slander' than to agree to their claim to pre-eminence in the clothing trade. Besides that, it is a service to the American people to tell them who their bosses are."

Regarding Mr. Straus's challenge to Mr. Ford to select eight members of a jury of ten to weigh and decide the facts the article says:

"The Dearborn Independent, in a very full and pertinent statement, laid the matter before the only competent judges in this cause, namely, before the American people, and it is now proper for Jewish spokesmen to meet the issue by addressing their defense to the same judges. Issuing new challenges does not obscure the fact that a previous one still stands.

"To suggest, as Mr. Straus does, a smaller jury of New York clergymen and publicists, who do not know a Jewish question exists and would not dare to say so if they did, is merely to pretend to be issuing a challenge while evading one already issued to whom it may concern."

CONSOLIDATED GAS TO OPEN NEW PLANT

$15,000,000 Project in Bronx to Add 20,000,000 Cubic Feet Daily to City's Supply.

The Consolidated Gas Company announced yesterday that it would shortly open its huge new manufacturing plant at Hunts Point, the Bronx, which has been under construction for more than a year. The opening may take place within a week or two. At a cost of $15,000,000 the new plant will increase New York's daily gas supply by 20,000,000 cubic feet, making a total daily supply of more than 200,000,000 cubic feet available to consumers in Manhattan and the Bronx. In addition to its output of gas, the new plant will supply about 1,200 tons of coke every day.

The manufacturing process at Hunts Point will be entirely different from that hitherto employed in New York, according to the company. The product will be coal gas exclusively, produced in coke ovens. No water gas will be made.

GREETS VANGUARD OF NEW SENATORS

Washington Sees Three Elected in November Take Seats —Awaits Eleven More.

AGE OF 'GIANTS' IS PAST

But Most of the Senators, Old and New, Have Had Careers of Human Interest.

HOBBIES OF THE NEWCOMERS

Hunting, Fishing, Horseback Riding and Dancing Among Their Favorite Diversions.

By RICHARD V. OULAHAN,
Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 11.—Three new figures appeared on the floor of the Senate when that body met Monday for the closing session of the Sixty-ninth Congress. They formed the advance squad of a formidable quota of recruits who will take the place of Senators whose names have become well known to the country. The later appearance of the full contingent will emphasize Democratic victories in the November elections.

Of the fourteen new Senators elected in November eleven are obliged to wait until next year, probably until December, before they will be able to qualify for the terms for which they were chosen. While the new Congress comes constitutionally into being next March, its activities will not be begun until nine months later—that is, a year from now—unless the President calls it in extraordinary session during the nine months' period, something Mr. Coolidge is credited with having no intention of doing.

Only One Democrat Yet Re-elected.

It is a striking feature of this prospective change in the Senate's personnel that only one Democrat, now a Senator, will not return to the new Congress. With that exception, every Democratic Senator who faced an expiring tenure was re-elected in November. And the case of that exception stresses his party's success for the reason that he was not a candidate for further service and a Democrat was chosen in his place.

The exception was Oscar W. Underwood of Alabama, a noted party leader, prominent exponent of a tariff for revenue only, whose name is associated in the minds of radio listeners-in with an oft-repeated sing-song about "twenty-to" votes." Senator Underwood's voluntary retirement comes after twenty years in the House of Representatives and twelve years in the Senate.

While the Senate has ninety-six members, the appearance of fourteen new faces will mean a considerable change in the make-up. It will suggest that parliamentary "virgin forest," to which expression Capital traditions attaches the name of Timothy J. Campbell of New York, a kindly disposed but keen-witted Tammany Representative.

The story is apocryphal, for it was one of Washington's favorite indoor sports during Mr. Campbell's Congressional career to place at his door responsibility for any cloakroom yarn whose point rested on some malapropos remark.

This particular story depicted Mr. Campbell conversing with a fellow Representative on the floor of the House of Representatives on the opening day of a new Congress, following an election which had played havoc in the Congressional ranks of one of the two major political parties. Gazing at the phalanx of strangers, Mr. Campbell remarked:

"This reminds me of a virgin forest."

"And what is a virgin forest, Tim?" his associate asked.

"A virgin forest," Mr. Campbell is reported to have explained, "is a forest where the hand of man has never placed its foot."

Whether the Senate will resemble a "virgin forest," within the meaning attributed to Mr. Campbell will remain for judgment until the Seventieth Congress convenes. Rather, it may resemble a cut-over forest, for the absence of its felled trees will be more conspicuous than the presence of their timbered successors.

If the metaphor is mixed, like Mr. Campbell's alleged observation, clarity will come to those who bear in mind that Underwood of Alabama, Wadsworth of New York, Lenroot of Wisconsin, Pepper of Pennsylvania, Butler of Massachusetts and others of note have passed from the Senate, all except Underwood through the ill-fortune of political war, and, with Fernald of Maine, Cummins of Iowa and McKinley of Illinois taken by death, after the two last named, like Pepper, Lenroot, Means of Colorado and Stanfield of Oregon, had fallen victims of primary battles.

Popular View of Senate.

Few men pass successfully through the ordeal of qualifying for the Senate who do not possess outstanding characteristics having an appeal to the electorate. A popular view is that in its personal aspect the Senate has degenerated.

"There were giants in those days" is not likely to be applied descriptively in future years to the personnel of the upper house of this generation. One explanation advanced by some Senators themselves is that, ordinarily, a Senator represents the average intelligence of his constituency, that he neither is conspicuously brilliant nor below the medium mental standard of his State's electorate, and that this is as mitted without prejudice and indirectly ignoring loud cries of protest from the House of Representatives, where the idea is firmly fixed that the House is the hard-working branch of Congress, the branch of accomplishment, given to sawing wood and saying nothing—or next to nothing, compared to the flow of oratory from the Senate end of the Capitol.

Some Interesting Personalities.

But if critical observers hold that the age of Senatorial giants has passed, it does not follow that the Senate lacks interesting personalities. Most of the men in that formerly august body have had careers not without some phase or incident that gives color to their lives, and the newcomers are no exception. What becomes known to the public concerning them usually pertains to their political histories, with the personal or human side neglected. Yet some insight into the human side frequently is more enticing than the mere recital of what they have done in the world of politics, or in their professional or business activities.

The advance guard of recruits consisted actually of four, instead of three, new Senators, if David W. Stewart of Iowa is included. But Senator Stewart, who took the Senatorial oath during the brief ten minutes of the special session of Nov. 10, when the Senate organized as a Court of Impeachment and then adjourned until December, will pass from the scene in March. He was elected to serve for the three months of the unexpired part of the term which Senator Albert B. Cummins was serving at the time of his death in July.

The sprightly Colonel Smith W. Brookhart, who was a member of the Senate until unkindly fate and an adverse majority cast him out to make way for Daniel F. Steck, the young Democrat, who was Brookhart's competitor in the contest of 1924, was elected for the full term of six years beginning next year.

Mr. Stewart served overseas in the Marines during the World War and earned the chevrons of a first sergeant. His youthful face belies his age—he will be 41 in January.

Mr. Stewart was figuratively knocked off his feet when nominated for the Senate by the State Convention in Des Moines.

"What will Mrs. Stewart say of this?" he exclaimed, with an accent of dismay, when the third ballot resulted in victory for him.

Two Familiar in Washington.

Of the three recruit Senators who were sworn in Monday, two are no strangers in Washington. One of them is Harry B. Hawes of Missouri, who resigned from the House of Representatives when he was nominated for the Senate in the Democratic primaries of his State. The other is David I. Walsh of Massachusetts, who served a term in the Senate up to March, 1925. When he took the oath Mr. Walsh was escorted to the rostrum by Senator Frederick H. Gillett, his Republican colleague, who defeated him for re-election two years ago.

The victory of Mr. Walsh attracted special attention, because he defeated Senator William M. Butler, Chairman of the Republican National Committee and President Coolidge's close friend. As Mr. Butler was serving by appointment only until the next general election, his tenure expired when Mr. Walsh's election was officially determined, and he passed out of the Senate.

Mr. Walsh is 54 years old. He is a bachelor and popular socially. Part of his success is attributed to engaging personal qualities. He is especially effective on the stump, his deep, rich voice dovetailing with the eloquence of his diction. Mr. Walsh is not devoted to any outdoor sport, but he manages to keep in good physical trim in spite of that fact.

He was 28 and a young lawyer when he was elected to his first political office as a member of the Massachusetts House of Representatives. Twice he was Governor of the State. Accounted good-looking, with a winning personality, and distinguished looking for a State noted for its intellectual, Mr. Walsh is much sought after for social functions, but has resisted all efforts to persuade him to abandon his bachelorhood. When serving his previous term as Senator he was a member of a fashionable dancing class which met at the mansion of Mrs. Thomas F. Walsh, and it is expected that he will resume the form of exercise that this diversion affords.

Hawes Fond of Fishing and Hunting.

Senator Hawes of Missouri, who stood near Senator Walsh when they took the oath of office on Monday, is an outdoor man, fond of shooting and fishing. Of athletic build, he tops six feet. He has a celebrated collection of fishing tackle. To recuperate from the exertions of his successful campaign for the Senatorship he went shooting in the Ozark Mountains. Sometimes Mrs. Hawes accompanies him on shooting trips and uses her own gun.

Senator Hawes has several hobbies, the chief of which, according to his intimates, is dogs. Neighbors of his farm in St. Louis County credit him with having owned 500, and it is said of him that while he gave most of them away he never sold one. For years he was President of the Mississippi Valley Kennel Club.

A speech he made on "dogs" was reprinted in England, Canada, Australia and Spain.

Out on his farm Senator Hawes breeds fancy chickens and pedigreed Berkshire hogs, one of which won the State championship. He was one of the prime movers for the recently enacted law of Congress which provides for establishing a wild game refuge of 341,000 acres on the Upper Mississippi River.

In the military service of the United States in the World War Mr. Hawes was assigned as attache of the embassy at Madrid. He became intensely interested in the works of Cervantes, and owns what is said to be the finest collection of the writings of Don Quixote's creator in this country. In a former residence in St. Louis he had a Spanish room that cost much time and more money to furnish.

Like his wife, Senator Hawes comes of distinguished American ancestry. His great-great-grandfather, William Cary Nicholas, died at Monticello and is buried there. Mrs. Hawes's great-great-grandfather was William B. Giles, Governor of Virginia and Senator. Mrs. Hawes's given name, Eppes, comes from the Jefferson family.

An interesting coincidence in connection with Senator and Mrs. Hawes is that in Thomas Jefferson's family burying ground at Monticello are buride the bodies of fourteen persons related to the family of either Senator Hawes or his wife.

Fireworks Over Gould.

The third member of the trio which swore to defend the Constitution on Monday is Arthur R. Gould, chosen a Senator from Maine in a special election on Nov. 30. His advent was marked by a sensational episode, when his right to membership was questioned on the ground that a Canadian Judge had implied in 1918 that he had been guilty of bribery in connection with railroad legislation pending before the Provincial Parliament of New Brunswick.

Mr. Gould is tall and rangy. His admirers describe him as a typical Yankee "go-getter." Looking at his appearance of phyical vigor, it is hard to believe that he will be 70 years old in March.

Senator Gould was the son of a farmer. He worked on farms, "clerked" in a country store, and was a traveling salesman before he undertook to operate a sawmill. Then he began building and operating more sawmills, and from that turned to harnessing water power. In time he was a builder of electric and steam railroads into the Maine wilderness.

Of the new Senators elected Nov. 2 who will appear to take the oath when the nextCongress convenes, Robert F. Wagner of New York has a conspicuous place in the public eye.

Any man who could defeat Senator James W. Wadsworth Jr. necessarily assumes an important position in the political world. An immigrant boy who spoke only German up to the age of 8, he sold newspapers in the streets of New York and applied his savings in that and other occupations to paying his tuition through the College of the City of New York. In 1905 he became an Assemblyman, then a State Senator and as Democratic leader in the Senate put through important labor legislation. When elected Senator, he was serving as a Judge of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court.

Tydings a War Veteran.

Like many others of the new Senators, Millard E. Tydings of Maryland served in the World War. He moved upward in the short period of our participation from enlisted man to the rank of Lieutenant Colonel, and besides earning the Distinguished Service Medal, was cited by Generals Pershing, Morton and Upton.

Young and of attractive personality, Mr. Tydings has been Speaker of the Maryland House of Delegates, a State Senator, and is now a member of Congress, serving his second term.

His nomination by the Democratic Party for Senator is generally attributed largely to a speech he made in the House on the prohibition question. Espousing the wet side, he made an argument that immediately attracted attention to his power as a special pleader. Like his friend, Governor Ritchie of Maryland, he is opposed to the extension of Federal encroachment and has waged a consistent battle against the pending bill for the establishment of a Department of Education, with representation in the Cabinet.

Down in Kentucky a lively battle for the Senatorship was waged this year with Senator Richard P. Ernst, the Republican incumbent, whose slogan was "Coolidge needs Ernst," opposed by Representative Albert W. Barkley, Democrat. Mr. Barkley won, and will take his seat in the new Senate. Still under 50, he was a Prosecuting Attorney and a Judge before being sent to Congress fourteen years ago. In spite of his enmity toward liquor and race tracks, Kentucky favored him on every occasion when he came before the electorate.

Mr. Barkley has been a persistent advocate of abolishing the pari-mutuel betting system permitted by a State law, and on that account aroused the fear that Kentucky's famous Derby, Latonia Handicap and Futurity meets were doomed and that untold damage would be done to the horse-breeding interests in the Blue Grass. With Senator Sheppard of Texas, he was joint author of the Congressional resolution which submitted the Eighteenth Amendment to the States, and was joint author also of the recent law which abolished the Railway Labor Board.

Vare a Self-Made Man.

Senator-elect William Scott Vare, Republican, of Pennsylvania, who will succeed Senator Pepper, is a self-made man. A country boy, he went to Philadelphia at the age of 15 and became a fish peddler. A hard worker, he soon made headway in business and, with a brother, established a firm of contractors that brought them a fortune. The political organization in Philadelphia which he heads savors of old-time Tammany Hall in its methods, and today Mr. Vare is one of the few organization "bosses" who manage to keep their machines intact.

Mr. Vare has a great personal following. He stands high with many merchants, and it is said that a considerable part of Philadelphia's population is satisfied that he will have no great difficulty in convincing the Senate that it should permit him to take his seat.

Senator-elect Frank L. Smith of Illinois, who, like Mr. Vare, will face a battery of opposition when he appears to take the oath of office, is another self-made man. First he was a cook-keeper and then became a country banker and stuck to that business with politics interspersed. He has served in Congress and was on terms of friendship there with the late Senator McKinley, whom he defeated for renomination in the Republican primaries, to find himself the centre of attack on the charge of having spent enormous sums in his primary campaign, part of them the contributions of great public utility interests.

In his personal aspect Senator-elect Frederick Steiwer of Oregon is considered handsome. He is more than six feet tall and weighs about 180 pounds. His diversion, like that of Senator Borah and others of the Senate, is horseback riding. He is an enthusiastic promoter of the cowboy rodeo held at Pendleton in his State, but does not take part in the broncho busting sports there.

Waterman Coolidge's Friend.

President Coolidge will have an ardent personal friend in the Senate when Charles W. Waterman of Colorado takes his seat there. Mr. Waterman was born at Ludlow, Vt., the home town of Attorney General Sargent, a few miles from the birthplace of the President at Plymouth. Although he left Vermont many years ago, he is still a trustee of the University of that State.

From Vermont Mr. Waterman went to Iowa, where he served as a school principal and took an active part in Republican politics, and then migrated to Denver. He is a lawyer and said to be wealthy.

The newly elected Democratic Senator from Oklahoma, Elmer Thomas is a Representative serving his second term. He was 50 last September. Born in Indiana, he taught a country school, went through college, and was admitted to the bar in that State before going to Oklahoma in 1900 to practice law. He is full of enthusiasm and is a great organizer of business and "boosting" associations.

Two La Follette Senators.

Colonel Smith W. Brookhart will return to the Senate from Iowa full of the enthusiasm which was his in the days of his former service there. His diversion is rifle shooting, and in the World War he was an instructor in rifle practice. He is a radical of radicals, opposed to most, if not all, of the Coolidge policies, and is expected to be an active member of the La Follette group in the Senate, as he was during his prior Senatorial experience. His middle name is Wildman and his political enemies have sought to show that it is no misnomer.

Another La Follette man wh will appear in the next Senate is Governor John J. Blaine of Wisconsin. He will displace Senator Lenroot, whom he defeated for renomination in the Republican primaries last September.

Senator-elect Carl Hayden of Arizona is serving his sixteenth year in the House of Representatives, although he will not be 50 until next October. He was conspicuous as a Sheriff in his State when Arizona Sheriff led colorful lives, and he is an accomplished horseman. In the World War he had the rank of Major.

Hugo Black, the sole new Democrat to appear in the next Senate, has obtained much publicity through being the successor of Senator Underwood, and on account of the support his candidacy received from the Ku Klux Klan. He is a bundle of activity, physically and mentally. As a lawyer he has made a specialty of looking after the interests of workmen injured in Alabama mines.

b—Exemptions. Nothing in any of the above provisions shall apply to vehicles running only on rails or tracks nor to any of the following vehicles when the same are responding to emergency work in case of fire, accident, public disaster or impending danger, to wit: Wagons, trucks and apparatus of the fire department, the insurance patrol, police department, the bureau of buildings or the militia, ambulances or the emergency repair wagons of public service corporations.

Right of Way.

a—Every driver of a vehicle approaching the intersection of a street or public road shall grant the right of way at such intersection to any vehicle approaching from his right, provided that wherever police officers are stationed they shall have full power to regulate traffic.

(Where traffic control light signals are in operation, such signals indicate the right of way, as provided by Article II, Section 2.)

b—Pedestrians, where no police officer is present and no traffic light control system is in operation, shall have the right of way on crossings and vehicles must slow down and stop, if necessary, to permit pedestrians on crossings to pass.

c—Fire department and fire patrol when going to, on duty at, or returning from a fire; ambulances, public or private, and other vehicles, when employed in conveying sick or injured persons to a hospital or other place of relief; police department, bureaus of buildings and emergency vehicles of the Department of Water Supply, Gas and Electricity and public service corporations, as accorded, by ordinance, the right of way over all other vehicles except those carrying the United States mail.

d—A vehicle, upon the approach of fire apparatus, shall immediately draw parallel to and as near to the right curb as possible, and stop.

e—A street car, upon the approach of fire apparatus, shall stop so as not to interfere with its passage.

Turning.

a—Right turns will be permitted at all times, subject to the provisions of Article II, Section 2b, except that vehicles making such turns in two-way streets shall not proceed to the left of the centre of either roadway; and except that vehicles in making such turns will not be permitted to cross in front of moving vehicular traffic and shall, at all times, when making such turns, slow down and keep as close to the righthand curb as possible.

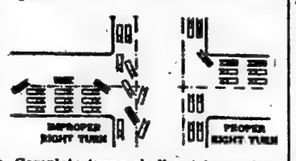
1. The turning point, governing left turns, shall be that point at street intersections where lines, if drawn through the centre of two-way streets or if drawn to prolong the left curb line of one-way streets, would meet.
2. Manner of turning.

Where no police officer is on duty and no traffic control light system is in operation, a vehicle, in turning to the left into another street, shall pass to the right of and around the turning point.

Where a police officer is on duty, a vehicle turning to the left into another street, shall approach the turning point in the extreme left lane of traffic proceeding in the same direction (exclusive of street car tracks), stand back of the crossing, await signal from the police officer, then pass to the left of and not around the officer.

Where a traffic control light system is in operation and no police officer is on duty, a vehicle turning to the left into another street shall approach the turning point in the extreme left lane of traffic proceeding in the same direction (exclusive of street car tracks), stand back of the crossing, wait until traffic on the street controlled by traffic lights is halted, then pass to the right of and around the turning point.



c—Complete turns shall not be made if the same interfere with orderly movement of traffic, and in such cases vehicles shall go around the block or to a street wide and clear enough for that purpose.

Meeting.

A vehicle meeting another proceeding in the opposite direction shall keep to the right.

Overtaking.

a—A vehicle overtaking another shall pass on its left and shall not pull over to the right until entirely clear of it; except that in overtaking a street car, it shall pass to the right if distance between car and curb permits. (See also signals, Article II, Section 15.)

b—A vehicle in overtaking a street car, which has been stopped for the purpose of receiving or discharging a passenger, shall not pass or approach to the right or left within eight (8) feet of any part of such car so long as the same is stopped and remains standing for the purposes aforesaid.

Following.

Following another vehicle too closely for safety is prohibited.

Keeping to the Right.

a—A moving vehicle shall keep as near as practicable to the right-hand curb, so that faster moving traffic may pass on the left.

b—A vehicle on a street divided by a parkway, walk, sunken-way, viaduct, isle of safety, traffic stanchion, or hack stand, shall keep to the right of such division except on a one-way traffic street.

c—A vehicle passing around a circle shall keep to the right from entrance to exit.

d—A vehicle shall keep to the right of any white line which divides a two-way roadway longitudinally.

Coasting.

Coasting on a down-grade with the gears of a vehicle in neutral is prohibited.

Control of Vehicles.

No person shall drive or ride a motor vehicle, motorcycle or bicycle without having a hand on the handle bars or steering device and no person shall drive, ride or lead a horse without continuously having the reins in his hand.

Bicycles.

No rider of a bicycle shall carry thereon any child under the age of 5 years or practice any trick or fancy riding on any roadway.

Drivers' Warning Signals.

A driver immediately before stopping, slowing up or making a right or left turn, shall give timely and unmistakable signal by means of a mechanical device, or by using the following hand signals:

Right Turn—Arm extended from side of car and pointed upward.

Left Turn—Arm extended from side of car and pointed straight out.

Stopping or Slowing Up—Arm extended from side of car and pointed downward.

Backing—A driver before backing shall give timely and ample warning.

Starting—A driver before starting from a curb shall indicate by hand or mechanical device the direction of turn into traffic.

Overtaking—A driver who wishes to pass another vehicle proceeding in the same direction shall signal his desire to do so, whereupon the driver of the vehicle to whom such signal is given shall promptly pull to the right so as to allow space in which to pass or shall warn by signal to slow up, that such passage is impossible.

Restricted Areas.

a—Sidewalks. No vehicle shall be driven on any sidewalk, except as provided in Article II, Section 5 and Article II, Section 17-m.

b—One-Way Street. A vehicle shall not proceed on a one-way street except in the direction indicated by arrows.

c—Play Streets. All vehicles are prohibited from using any street designated as a play street, except as the requirements of the residents of the property abutting such play street may call for.

d—Fire Drill Line. No person shall drive a vehicle of any kind through a line of children issuing from or returning to a school during a fire drill, nor interfere with, hinder, obstruct or impede in any way whatsoever any such fire drill.

e—Safety Zone. It shall be unlawful for any person to drive a vehicle within a safety zone.

f—Commercial vehicles are prohibited on roadways designated by proper authority.

g—Bridges and Viaducts. No person shall, without permission in writing from the Commissioner of Plant and Structures, operate or drive on any bridge or viaduct under the jurisdiction of the Department of Plant and Structures, any steam or gasoline road rollers, steam or gasoline shovels, or any motor truck or trailer having a width inclusive of load of more than eight feet or having a height of more than 13 feet 6 inches or having a length, inclusive of load, of more than twenty-eight feet in the case of a motor truck or of more than eighteen feet in the case of a trailer, or having wheels equipped with other than rubber tires, or having a weight in excess of that provided by Chapter 4, Article 1, Section 3, Code of Ordinances.

Standing, Stopping and Waiting.

a—A vehicle, other than a street car, shall not stand unless held up by traffic, in any street except at the curb and shall not stop with its left side to the curb except on a one-way street.

b—A vehicle shall not so occupy any street as to obstruct traffic.

c—A vehicle shall not stop so as to obstruct a crossing except in an emergency.

d—A vehicle shall not be permitted to stand backed up at any angle to the curb, except while actually loading or unloading, and if horse-drawn and with four wheels, the horse shall stand parallel with the curb, faced in the direction of traffic.

e—A vehicle shall not be left in such a position as to prevent another from moving up parallel and close to the curb in front of the entrance to a building, nor so as to prevent another already stopped near the curb from moving away.

f—A vehicle waiting at the curb shall promptly give way to another vehicle arriving to take on or set down passengers or merchandise.

g—A vehicle waiting at the curb near a corner shall not be permitted to stand within fifteen feet of the building line of any intersecting street.

h—A vehicle shall not be permitted to wait at the curb between a car stop safety zone and the curb, nor within twenty-five feet of such zone.

i—A vehicle shall not be permitted to stand within ten feet of a fire hydrant.

j—A vehicle, when stopped, or left unattended on a street where there is a grade shall have wheels turned at an angle against the curb and not parallel with the curb.

k—A vehicle shall not stand within twenty-five feet of any street excavation or obstruction, except that when such excavation or obstruction is at or close to a curb, vehicles may stand at that curb, but not so as to obstruct traffic.

l—A street car shall not stop within an intersection of streets nor within five feet of a street car ahead nor so as to obstruct a crossing.

m—On a thoroughfare where street railroad tracks are laid so close to the curb that a vehicle, if standing there, would obstruct the free passage of the cars, the owner or occupant of any premises may, during business hours, place as much of the vehicle on the sidewalk as may be necessary to permit the passage of such cars, provided he has left a sufficient passageway for pedestrians between the front of the building and the vehicle.

n—A horse shall not be unbridled nor left unattended in a street or unenclosed place without being securely fastened, unless harnessed to a vehicle with wheels so secured as to prevent its being dragged faster than a walk.

Parking.

a—Vehicles shall not be allowed to park for a period exceeding the following:

One hour in the congested or business sections of the city.

Two hours in a designated parking space.

Three hours between 12 P. M. and 7 A. M.

b—Parking in the vicinity of places of public amusement is prohibited except in temporary parking spaces designated by the Police Commissioner, but not longer than is actually required to attend such entertainment.

c—A vehicle shall not be parked for the purpose of making repairs except those of a minor nature and then only in cases of emergency.

d—Special parking restrictions in a specific area are indicated by signs of the Police Department and drivers must at all times comply with the directions thereon.

e—Parking is prohibited from 7 A. M. to 10 A. M. and from 5 P. M. to 7 P. M. on the following named streets, south of Fifty-ninth Street, Manhattan, daily, except Sundays and holidays: Park Avenue, Fourth Avenue, Lafayette Street, Madison Avenue, Fifth Avenue, Sixth Avenue, Seventh Avenue, Varick Street and Broadway.

f—A vehicle left in the street, except in compliance with the above provisions, shall be deemed an encumbrance within the meaning of Section 152, Article 13, Chapter 23 of the Code of Ordinances, and may be removed.

Qualifications of Drivers.

a—Other than Motor Vehicles. Drivers or persons in charge of vehicles other than licensed vehicles shall not be less than 16 years of age, unless provided with a permit from the Police Department.

b—Motor Vehicles: Drivers of motor vehicles must be 18 years of age and must be licensed as provided for by the Motor Vehicle law.

Reporting Accidents.

a—Other than Motor Vehicles. The driver of any vehicle other than a motor vehicle, involved in an accident resulting in death or injury or damage to property, must stop and give his and his employer's name and address to the party sustaining injuries or damage, and in the case of death or injury, he must in addition to the above without delay report the accident to the nearest police station, unless he has supplied the information to a police officer on the scene.

b—Motor Vehicles. Drivers of motor vehicles must report accidents in the manner prescribed by the provisions of the Motor Vehicle law.

Smoke.

No person shall cause, suffer or allow dense smoke to be discharged from any motor vehicle within the City of New York.

CONSTRUCTION, EQUIPMENT AND LOADING.

General.

No vehicle shall be used on the public highways when it is so constructed, enclosed, equipped or loaded as to be dangerous, retard traffic or prevent the driver from having a view sufficient for safety.

Brakes and Steering Mechanism.

Every motor vehicle operated on the public highways * * * shall be provided with adequate brakes and steering mechanism in good working order and sufficient to control such vehicle at all times when the same is in use. (Motor Vehicle Law).

Horns.

a—Every motorcycle or motor vehicle operated or driven on the streets of this city shall be provided with an adequate warning or signaling device. This device, whether horn or whistle, must be operated by hand power or electricity, and the use of horns, whistles or other devices operated by the engine exhaust of motorcycles or motor vehicles is prohibited.

b—No persons having the management or control of any automobile or vehicle or operating the engine thereof shall use a horn or other device for signaling except in a reasonable manner as a danger warning, nor shall any such person produce or cause, suffer or allow to be produced by means of any such horn or other signaling device a sound which shall be unnecessarily loud or harsh or which shall continue for an unnecessary and unreasonable period of time.

Owners of vehicles of all description operating on the streets of the city, including vehicles of private ambulance concerns, shall not use a bell or gong the same as or similar to the one used by the hospitals throughout the city.

d—The use of a siren on any vehicle except those having the right of way as provided by Article II, Section 60, is prohibited.

Mirrors (Trucks and Buses).

A motor truck or motor omnibus, when driven or operated upon a public highway, shall be equipped with a mirror or other reflecting device so adjusted that the operator of such vehicle shall have a clear and full view of the road and condition of traffic behind such vehicle. (Motor Vehicle Law.)

a—Horse-Drawn Vehicles. Every vehicle (horse drawn) using the streets shall show, between sunset and sunrise, a light or lights so placed as to be seen from the front, rear and each side. If a dash lantern is carried it shall be placed on the left-hand side. Such light or lights shall be of sufficient illuminating power to be visible a distance of 200 feet, and shall show white in front, but may be colored on the sides and rear.

b—Motor Vehicles (except Motorcycles).

1. Every motor vehicle, except motorcycles, shall exhibit during the period specified (sunset to sunrise) two white lights, visible at a distance of 200 feet in the direction toward which the vehicle is proceeding, and shall also exhibit a red light, visible in the reverse direction. The lights shall be placed so as to be free from obstruction by other parts of said vehicle. No operator of any motor vehicle, while operating the same upon any street, shall use any acetylene, electric or other headlight, unless it shall be so shaded as not to blind or dazzle other users of the highway or make it difficult or unsafe for them to ride, drive or walk thereon.
2. Except as otherwise provided in Article III, Section 5b-1 (above), every motor vehicle, except motorcycles, using the roadways of the City of New York shall be equipped with and display lights in the manner provided for by the Motor Vehicle law (see Article II, Section 286, Highway Law, State of New York).

c—Motorcycles. Every motorcycle using the roadways of the City of New York shall be equipped with and display lights in the manner provided for by the Motor Vehicle Law (Article IIa, Section 305, Highway Law, State of New York), except that such lights must be displayed from sunset to sunrise.

Muffler Cut-Outs.

No operator or driver of any motor vehicle shall use any cut-out, fitting or other apparatus or device which shall allow the exhaust gases to escape into the atmosphere without passing through a muffler or silencer.

Windshields and Rear Windows.

The use or placing of posters or stickers on windshields or rear windows of motor vehicles other than those authorized by the Commissioner of Motor Vehicles is hereby prohibited. (Motor Vehicle Law.)

a—No vehicle shall be so overloaded that the horse or motor attached thereto shall be unable to draw or propel it.

b—A vehicle when loaded with any material extending beyond its rear shall be provided with a red flag by day and a red light at night on the extreme rear end of such load.

c—No vehicle shall be loaded with iron or other material in such a manner as to create loud noises while in transit.

d—No vehicle used on a roadway shall, while in motion, have scales or the beam thereof, or any other implement used for the handling of merchandise, protrude or hang outside of or beyond such vehicle.

Towing and Trailers.

No vehicle shall tow more than one other vehicle on a public thoroughfare, except vehicles of municipal departments, vehicles on rails or trucks, and in any case the connection shall not be longer than sixteen feet.

TRAFFIC SIGNS AND SIGNALS.

Official Signs.

Drivers must at all times comply with directions on signs or street markings for the regulation of traffic placed by the Police Department or various other municipal departments having jurisdiction over specific areas.

Other Than Official Signs Prohibited.

No person shall erect or maintain upon any roadway or sidewalk any sign or marking purporting to direct or restrict traffic unless by proper authority.

Damaging Signs.

No person shall remove, deface, damage or interfere with any sign, marking, stanchion or signal light placed by proper authority for the regulation of traffic.

NOTE—Amendments to these regulations which may be made from time to time are published in The City Record.

Hurt Fatally In Practical Joke.

BINGHAMTON, N. Y., Dec. 11 (AP).—Michael Jovonosky, 32, is believed to be fatally injured as the result of a practical joke when a fellow-employe placed a compressed air hose against his body in such a manner as to rupture the intestines. An operation has been performed in an effort to save Jovonosky's life. This is the second incident of the kind occurring in the vicinity, the first victim having partly recovered but becoming a nervous wreck.

KANS IN FERMENT TIRANA TREATY

Personage in Sofia Says Alliance Will Prevent War, but Others Disagree.

YUGOSLAVS SEE ENEMY RING

Recent Friendliness to Italy Has Vanished, and Albania Is Called Danger Spot.

OTHER CAPITALS ALARMED

Belgrade, Angora and Sofia Doubt That Mussolini Can Achieve Ends Sought by Peaceful Methods.

By ERNEST MARSHALL.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BELGRADE, Dec. 11.—"There will be war in the Balkans next Spring," said a high personage in Sofia a few days ago.

There had just been a complete change in the weather. After a long period of drought the skies had clouded over and the parched earth was greedily drinking in the heavens' rain.

"Plots and war in the Balkans have always depended more upon Providence than most people imagined," continued the personage in question, talking quite seriously. "When the rains come at the right time, good crops are assured, and when the agricultural populations of these regions are busy with their contents, owing to the plentiful dispensations of Providence, political and racial questions lose much of their activity. This year the prospects are favorable."

His confident prediction was made just after the announcement of the ratification of the treaty signed at Tirana on Nov. 27 between Italy and Albania sent an electric shock throughout the Near East and caused tremors in several Western capitals. Under conditions less favorable to peace than now happily exist, the drums of war might already have been heard beating their alarm.

Only about a month ago the Serbian Minister of Foreign Affairs, M. Nintchitch, was congratulating himself and his country on the improvement which had come about in the relations between Yugoslavia and Italy. For some years after the great war these relations had been subjected to considerable strain. There existed differences which some authorities feared could only be settled finally by the arbitrament of the sword. The French, backing the Little Entente, seemed to lay Italy open to attack upon two fronts in the eventuality of war with either Greece or Yugoslavia and the latter's ally. The influence of Paris in the Balkans was predominant.

Nintchitch's Success Nullified.

One of the indirect results of Locarno was the visit which M. Nintchitch paid to Signor Mussolini, which led to the conclusion of the treaty of amity signed in Rome in 1924. Subsidiary conventions, designed to complete the good understanding then reached, were drawn up and in some instances ratified. Ratification of some others of these subsidiary conventions was delayed for various reasons, among which the standing of Italian laborers along the Adriatic seaboard of Yugoslavia was one of the most important.

To this latter group of deferred conventions figured what is known as the Nettuno Convention, in which, according to report, there were secret clauses, of which more anon.

M. Nintchitch's visit to Premier Mussolini appeared to have changed the whole aspect of the Balkan situation. Signor Mussolini was accredited by his press as having established Italian hegemony in the Danube Valley. Rumania had been won by the Italian contribution of 500,000,000 lire for the stabilization of her currency, and Hungary, alienated by the Italian attitude in regard to the Tisza estates episode, was drawing close to Yugoslavia and thereby to Italy.

Italy and Yugoslavia together seemed to have conquered a predominant position, more than offsetting in importance that of France and Czechoslovakia. Yugoslavia was proud and happy over the results of M. Nintchitch's policy, although the latter's opponents in Belgrade and Zagreb criticized it as being contrary both to good sense and national sentiment.

Signor Mussolini accepted without question assurances received from Belgrade that the denunciation of the Nettuno régime recently indulged in by M. Raditch, leader of the Opposition in the Yugoslavian Parliament, was merely a political manoeuvre directed against M. Nintchitch and his colleagues.

The Duce remembered his own outbursts against France and Germany on occasions less serious than the arrest of the Slovenian Deputy Vilfan in Rome, which had moved M. Raditch to wrath.

Thus, the political sky of Italy and Yugoslavia seemed a cerulean hue. Then, like a bolt from the blue, came the announcement of the Tirana Treaty, which seemed not far removed from the constitution of a virtual Italian protectorate over the Republic of Albania.

Belgrade was flabbergasted, to use an expressive word not usually employed in the language of diplomacy. M. Nintchitch resigned the Portfolio of Foreign Affairs and the rest of the Cabinet, headed by M. Ouzunovitch, had no option but to leave office with him. From the point of view of domestic affairs, the situation was not very seriously complicated by these Ministerial changes in the Kingdom of the Serbs, Croats and Slovenes, for a Cabinet reconstitution was about to take place under any circumstance. But the departure of M. Nintchitch from the Ministry of Foreign Affairs was of the highest importance, for he held that post, but for a brief interval of three months, since 1922 and had given an entirely new orientation to Yugoslavian policy in an earnest effort to maintain good relations with Serbia's neighbors on a basis of the status created by the peace treaties concluded since the great war. His immediate resignation was an inevitable sequence to the Tirana treaty.

That instrument was a double shock to M. Nintchitch. The President of the Albanian Republic, Ahmed Beg Zogou, was in a certain sense his protégé, owing his election largely to Serbian influence. That was blow number one. Blow number two is to be looked for in widely accepted reports that in the Nettuno convention there was a secret clause agreed to by Signor Mussolini personally that the influence of Yugoslavia should be considered paramount in regard to the external relations of Albania.

A glance at the map suffices to show the grounds upon which M. Nintchitch based this secret stipulation, if any such existed in reality. Albania territorially is wedged in Yugoslavia. Whether or not the latter may have entertained an ambition of merging Albanian independence in the Kingdom of the Serbs, Croats and Slovenes is a point on which opinions differ, but on principle it is advocated by Belgrade that the Balkans belong to the Balkan peoples and foreign intervention in the affairs of the Albanian Republic could not but arouse objection.

Belgrade objects most strenuously to what it believes to be not only the unjustifiable intervention of Italy in Balkan affairs but to the direct menace to the peace and security of Yugoslavia. During the régime of Ahmed Beg Zogou's predecessor raids into Serbian territory by Albanian brigands were frequent. That Zogou should have been so ungrateful to Belgrade, which helped him to the Presidency, stings worse than a serpent's tooth in Serbian feelings about the Tirana treaty, which Zogou now has concluded with Mussolini.

Italian supremacy in Albania looks to Belgrade like a spearhead directed against Yugoslavia. Whereas, before the Tirana treaty the Kingdom of the Serbs, Croats and Slovenes contemplated with satisfaction the spectacle of a circle of neighboring nations—with possibly the single exception of Bulgaria—with which she might hope to live in pleasant relations, she now sees herself surrounded by a ring of possible enemies, for she argues that if Italy has played her false in respect to Albania, Italy may equally play a double game in regard to the other Balkan States.

In his letter of resignation, M. Nintchitch said he wished to direct the attention of Europe to events which had culminated in the Tirana Treaty. In that he certainly succeeded.

Just at that moment statesmen representing many countries of the world on the Council of the League of Nations were meeting in Geneva to discuss means of giving complete and concrete form to the ideals embodied in the Locarno agreements. To them, almost without exception, Tirana was the direct antithesis of Locarno. A new danger zone was created while old ones were being sterilized. The Italo-Albanian treaty seemed a step toward the realization of the Italian ambition of domination in the Mediterranean.

Sir Austen Chamberlain, with characteristic determination to look on the bright side of the medal, emphasized Premier Mussolini's statement that Yugoslavia was free to conclude with Albania a treaty along similar lines to that which Italy had made.

Most of the other opinions were less ingenuous. It was recalled that one of Signor Mussolini's lieutenants, Senator Cippico, in a lecture in the United States some time ago developed the theory of the Mediterranean as an Italian lake, and the Duce's own enthusiasms over "mare nostrum" had not allayed French and British suspicions of a policy antagonistic to their special interests in the tideless sea.

Throughout Southern Europe the general impression was that Tirana had injected a new complication into an already difficult situation. One statesman who commented on Signor Mussolini's rejoinder to Serbian criticism said it did not even merit the label of "Se non è vero, è ben trovato [even though it is not true, it is well told].

Happily, the latest information received here is to the effect that the Italian Government is not unappreciative of the fact that the Tirana Treaty is not viewed with a friendly eye by the rest of the world, and a suggestion that the dual treaty may be expanded into a tripartite agreement between Italy, Yugoslavia and Albania may lead to a satisfactory solution.

Other Capitals Alarmed.

In other Near Eastern capitals besides Belgrade the suspicion with which—rightly or wrongly—Mussolini's policy of creating Italian hegemony in the Balkans is regarded has been intensified to no small degree by the publication of the Tirana Treaty. That instrument is held to be the thin end of the wedge by means of which Italy plans to insure a solution of her domestic problems, which the necessities of her rapidly growing population will create.

Here in Budapest, no less than in Angora and Sofia, not to mention Belgrade, many doubts are expressed as to the possibility of Mussolini succeeding in his declared policy of finding outlets for Italian expansion by peaceful methods, and they talk of an appeal to the League of Nations.

As the Duce himself outlines his ambitions, they seem reasonable and reliable, but not everybody is as convinced of the direct interposition of Providence in international affairs as the high personage quoted at the beginning of this dispatch.

RIDING A HORSE HERE FROM BUENOS AIRES

Teacher Reaches Panama After Trip Through Desert and Jungle and Over Mountain Peaks.

ARGUMENT LED TO JOURNEY

Tschiffley and Boy With Pony, Who Joined Him in Ecuador, Hope to Ride Up Broadway Soon.

Special Correspondence of THE NEW YORK TIMES.

PANAMA, Nov. 27.—An argument between Aime H. L. Tschiffley, an English school teacher, who had never owned a horse, and prominent horsemen of Buenos Aires regarding the endurance of the native horses of the pampas of Patagonia, resulted in the former starting out to ride to New York in order to prove his case.

The teacher was backed by the Argentine Criollo Breeders' Association, and now, with the two horses with which he started from Buenos Aires, he is safe and sound in Panama with more than half of his trip, the worst of what seemed an impossible journey, completed.

The only interruption in the long ride came between Medellin, Colombia, and Panama. This part of the journey he had to make by boat. Against the advice of people long familiar with the country, he first made a vain attempt to get through the dangerous jungle, in which there are no trails and through which no white man has ever traveled. Even the Indian inhabitants of the jungle have to resort to the rivers and canoes for travel.

The rest of the 12,000 miles on horseback will be easy compared to what has already been accomplished. It will take this modern Don Quixote through Panama, Costa Rica, Nicaragua, Salvador, Guatemala, Mexico, across the Texas border and then on to Broadway.

One Horse Is 16 and Other 17.

The horses are geldings, aged 16 and 17 years. One, a "pinto," is about 14.2 hands, and the other, a dark buckskin, is less than 14 hands high. Their ages are attested by the bill of sale from the ranchero who sold them to the present owner and by the certificate of ownership issued by the Argentine Government.

No one in Argentina can travel a horse without these papers, which are designed to prevent horse stealing.

The two horses were taken from a herd in Patagonia and had not been broken to saddle when bought.

The "pinto" shows unmistakable points of his Arabian forebears, which escaped from the Spanish explorers and conquistadores to run wild on the broad pampas. He has the broad forehead, deep jowls and Roman nose, the white spots faintly outlined against deep red bay, and the wide, deep chest of the progenitors of the present-day thoroughbred.

So far as permanent blemishes are concerned, an examination by an expert veterinarian shows that both horses are as sound as the day they were foaled on the wind-swept plains of Patagonia.

Neither Stood Quen Lama.

Except for a slight swelling of the pastern joints, caused by the boat trip down the Magdalena River and up the coast to Colon, their rather large-boned legs are clean and sound. In all of the more than 6,000 miles of every kind of trail, and often no trail at all, neither horse has shown the slightest sign of lameness.

This twentieth-century "Don Quixote de la Mancha," as he is called by the Argentine newspapers, has been on the trip since April 23, 1925, and he hopes to reach Broadway early next year. The "pinto" is his saddle horse, the other being used for packing. The "pinto's" name is Mancha. When asked if that referred to the mythical domain of the Knight of the Sorrowful Countenance, Tschiffley smiled and explained:

"The spots on the 'pinto' are dirty, look soiled or stained, and the Spanish word for that condition is 'manchada,' but the gauches pronounce it 'manchao,' so I merely dropped the 'o' and arrived at the name."

Although Mancha is not entirely gray he fits well the description of Don Quixote's famous charger, Rosinante.

Ridiculed by Newspapers.

This daring horseman has traveled alone for most of the journey, but in Ecuador he picked up an orphan boy for whom he purchased a pony. Now the man and the boy, the two horses and the pony will complete together a trip that will far surpass anything yet attempted or accomplished in the way of an endurance test for horses.

Mr. Tschiffley has spent several years on the plains of Patagonia, where every one rides, and as a result of that experience he became interested in attempting something that had never before been tried.

First he suggested a ride to Bolivia, but the newspapers of the Argentine capital ridiculed the idea, so he proposed to ride even further, to Lima, Peru, a distance of 1,800 miles. Again the newspapers gave him the figurative "horse laugh," and said that no horse, not even an Argentine Criollo, could stand such a journey. This was the last straw, and Mr. Tschiffley then announced that he would ride his horses to New York or die in the attempt.

Aided by Argentina.

Little was thought of his boast by the newspapers and the general public, but the breeders of the Criollos and the Argentine Government showed enough interest in the matter to offer some encouragement by giving him special passports and letters to use on the trip.

Nevertheless, when he left Buenos Aires there were just three people present to bid him good-bye. They were photographers sent by the newspapers, which were still inclined to treat the adventure as a good joke. Mr. Tschiffley was the only serious-minded member of the party, but now the newspapers of Buenos Aires are asking for reports from every point on the journey.

From Buenos Aires the horseman rode to Rosario. He then entered the salt beds of Santiago de Estero, which are 300 miles in extent, and across which it was not believed any horseman could travel, due to the lack of forage and water. At the end of twenty days horses and rider arrived at Tucuman little the worse for the journey.

Three Miles Above Sea Level.

Thence the route was to La Quiaca, on the border of Bolivia, and for the first time a horse was ridden from the capital of Argentina to Bolivia. From La Quiaca the trail led up into the Andes to Potosi, about 13,300 feet above sea level.

Few, if any, horses had ever visited that city before, llamas and donkeys being the only beasts of burden that can live at that altitude and be of any use.

Mr. Tschiffley says that he reached even higher altitudes in his rides across the Andes, but has no record, as his barometer was broken in going over the rough trails.

On the journey from Lake Popo to La Paz, through the Aymora Indian country, in searching for some skulls in an ancient burial ground, Mr. Tschiffley scratched a finger and contracted blood poisoning that became so serious that his life was in danger. He was finally cured with herbs applied by an Indian medicine man, who charged him 40 cents for the treatment, which took four days.

From Snow to Mosquitos.

From La Paz the ride was continued along the western shore of Lake Titicaca for eight days to the ancient Inca city of Cuseo, and thence over the mountains to Lima, Peru.

It was a case of spending one night in the snow on the top of a mountain and the next night in the valley amid tropical growth and mosquitos. In order to protect his mounts from the attacks of deadly vampire bats he covered them with large canvas blankets.

At the end of nine months, during which the rough trails, torrential rains and ever-present mud made him sometimes wish he had never undertaken the task, rider and horses reached Lima, having covered 3,500 miles of the journey. After a rest he started across one of the worst bits of his journey, the desert between Lima and Piura. He made the trip across this waste, which is covered with human skulls and the bones of animals, in twenty hours, covering in that time ninety-six miles, the longest day's travel in the journey.

As it was impossible to carry sufficient water for himself and mounts, he prepared a mixture of lime juice and salt, so distasteful that an occasional swallow discouraged thirst.

Close to Famous Volcanoes.

From Piura he again climbed into the Andes to an altitude of 8,000 feet, then across the Ecuadorian border close to Chimborazo and Cotopaxi, famous volcanoes, to the City of Quito, 9,600 feet above sea level.

After a rest of three weeks in Quito he continued through the mountains and into the Ecuadorian jungles to Colombia, through the beautiful Cauca Valley to Manisales and Medellin.

Here he was warned that it would be impossible to go to Panama overland, but he tried, nevertheless, and, much gainst his will, was convinced. The Argentine consul cabled his Government that to attempt the trip to Panama would mean death for the rider and horses, and asked for instructions. The reply came ordering him to ship horses and rider by boat to Panama.

Mr. Tschiffley has Dallas, Texas; Chicago, the horse-breeding country of Kentucky and other places on his route for New York. He says he would like to bring a troupe of the "gauchos" and their Criollo horses to New York to join in a rodeo with cowboys from the Western plains of the United States.

All Live Off the Country.

Another remarkable thing about this test is the fact that the horses have had no grain feed, except for short periods when stopping in the towns. For the rest of the journey they have lived off the country through which they traveled, and their rider admits that it was often very poor living for both man and beast.

Mr. Tschiffley appears to be less than 40 years old and more than 140 pounds in weight. He is of medium height, with clear blue eyes and the red hair not uncommon to adventurers of his type. He is deeply tanned by the sun, well sprinkled with rusty-looking freckles, and looks as wiry and tough physically as his two Criollo horses.

ORIENTAL ART ON VIEW.

Chinese and Japanese Objects to Be Sold by T. Okajima.

Chinese and Japanese objects of art now on view at the Anderson Galleries are to be auctioned next Friday and Saturday.

Carved jades, agates, rose quarts, amethyst, crystal and other semi-precious stones; brocades, ivories, porcelains, Chinese coats, Japanese kimonos, jade flowers in pots and other articles are offered by T. Okajima of the Japan Art Studio.

A miniature drum-shaped red and gold lacquer aquarium with a garden inside, twenty-seven inches high, is a novelty; and jade table screen lamps and table screens are also being shown. An old orange-colored wall hanging is decorated with gold and other colored ho-ho birds, peony branches and clouds and wave decorations and is mounted with cream-colored brocade panels in lotus designs.

In jewelry there is a Siamese Princess' finger ring, a coiled gold dragon with loose tongue set with ruby and pin tourmalines from head to tail; carved green jade bracelets and amber, turquoise, carnelian, malachite, coral and other necklaces and pendants.

A group of large ivory figures contains two tall standing buddistic figures of women. There are rose quarts Quan Yins, carved animals and fowl of semi-precious stones, snuff bottles, Peking enamel, glass and cloisonné.

TOO MANY SANTAS VEX MOTHERS OF CHICAGO

Children Are Declared Puzzled by 'Flat-Footed, Hollow-Chested' Yule Saints on Every Corner.

CHICAGO, Dec. 11 (AP).—Mothers of youngsters who still believe in Santa Claus are irritated because there are so many impersonators of the ruddy Yuletide saint on downtown street corners.

One parent, objecting in a letter to a newspaper that she cannot take junior shopping because she has to explain so many Santa Clauses, suggests that the "flat-footed, sallow-chested, pasty-cheeked individuals," who bid for charities in Christmas shopping crowds should be stripped of their Santa Claus regalia, dressed in neat uniforms and designated as Santa's helpers.

It is very hard, another complains, for a harassed mother to explain to a youngster the presence of a Santa Claus every two rods down the length of downtown State Street.

RECALL OF HARTLEY VIEWED AS UNLIKELY

Opponents of the Washington Governor Not at All Eager to Sign Petitions.

NO AID FROM EXECUTIVE

He Disappoints Those Seeking His Removal by Preserving Unexpected Silence.

COAST TRANSIT TROUBLES

Seattle's Difficulties Increasing, With San Francisco Facing a Possible Scandal.

By ALFRED HOLMAN.

Special to The New York Times.

SAN FRANCISCO, Dec. 11.—The movement in Washington for the recall of Governor Hartley is going slow. The constitutional requirement for initiation of recall procedure calls for a popular petition signed by approximately 80,000 citizens and it will be remembered that when the project was set on foot it was proposed to secure 100,000 or more signatures and to have the petition ready by Dec. 1 or earlier. The plan has not worked out according to program. It has not been found as easy to secure signatures as was expected; and this experience goes to discredit the theory so often asserted that signatures in any number may be obtained to any sort of petition.

As related to the contest as it stands between Governor Hartley and the support of President Suzzallo of the State University, the balance of popular favor rests with the latter beyond a doubt. If nothing more than an expression of confidence and good-will was asked, the vote would go heavily for Dr. Suzzallo. But the movement for recall is a more serious proposal. It runs counter to political tradition and to the popular habit of mind. Many citizens vociferously resentful against Hartley and as openly sympathetic to Suzzallo are opposed to the recall on principle and would prefer to let matters run a normal course than to give recognition and support to a procedure that would create so far-reaching a precedent.

Further, it is the judgment of many that if the movement against the Governor should succeed to the point of getting itself formally inaugurated, its sequel would be a humiliating collapse. It is suspected that sober second thought, already evident in the difficulty of getting signatures, will incline many, even among the signers, to join in subsequent protest. Still further, as time goes on, it is impressed upon the popular mind that although the Governor's action in bringing about Suzzallo's dismissal was from every point of view a grave mistake, it was in no sense criminal, and that reprehensible as it was, it does not merit so severe a rebuke as would be implied in his recall.

Ideas Not Far Apart.

There is popular recognition of the fact that the matters at issue between Governor Hartley and Dr. Suzzallo are subject to legitimate difference of opinion; and there are many to insist that while the Governor's policies are too radical and his method of enforcing them void of tact, much may be said in support of his proposals regarded fundamentally. That there are very serious defects in the educational system of the State is not denied. Dr. Suzzallo himself is on record as proposing reforms in practice at many points parallel with those urged by the Governor. The pity of the situation is that the two authorities should not have so far compromised personal antagonisms as to have worked together to promote many things on which they are practically agreed.

Protest against the movement for recall has lacked neither popular support nor force of organization. By a close observer of the situation I am informed that the recall promoters calculated and hoped that Governor Hartley would in anger and resentment enter upon a noisy and vituperative fight. This expectation has been disappointed. Left to himself, he probably would have gone to indiscreet lengths of utterance and action. But it is declared that the organization created in his behalf laid down as a first condition that the Governor should be silent and allow his friends to carry forward the defensive campaign. The effect has been to disconcert the recall promoters, whose tactics were largely based upon the notion that if the Governor were given plenty of rope he would hang himself.

Another expectation was that Governor Hartley would carry the fight to the Legislature, especially in an attempt to obtain for one of his adherents the speakership of the House of Representatives. Here again the Governor, under the counsel of his friends, has acted with moderation, to the disappointment of his enemies.

In relation to all these matters, the course of Dr. Suzzallo has been admirable. He has made no statements and has taken no part in any phase of the controversy. Availing himself of invitations in the line of his profession as an educator, he has visited various parts of the country and delivered addresses upon academic and social subjects. Nowhere has he referred to matters political or personal. With unruffled dignity he has left his cause to plead for itself. In at least one instance he has declined the suggestion of professional employment elsewhere, insisting that he owes to the State of Washington an obligation that, under the existing conditions, he is not at liberty to cancel. To suggestions that he present himself as a candidate for the Governorship in opposition to Hartley, he has not deigned to give a moment's attention. Obviously he relies on the people of Washington to sustain his cause, and it is beyond question that popular feeling is favorable to him.

Seattle's Transit Troubles.

Seattle's troubles in relation to her municipally owned street railway system tend to multiply. A month ago there came a situation in which the system was compelled to go on a "warrant basis"; that is, to meet its obligations not in cash but with promises to pay. Concurrently, to meet the requirements of tax charges and other obligations apart from operating charges the Street Railway Department must between now and March accumulate $1,730,000, which is beyond the limit of possibility; in fact, the assurance is for an increasing deficit.

Month by month the deficit grows. According to the latest report, at the end of last September the losses for nine months of the current year were $179,200, and clerical estimates indicate that the loss for the year will run to something more than $200,000. The present liabilities are $775,000 above assets.

Among special embarrassments is a delinquent tax bill, for 1919, of $545,000 with accrued interest at the approximate rate of $80 a day. In an effort to wipe out this obligation, attorneys for the city invoked the statute of limitations on the authority of a municipal charter requirement that "all claims for damages must be filed within thirty days." The Court rejected this plea, referring to the fact that the city had "in the most solemn manner asserted its obligation to pay its portion of the taxes."

Despite all efforts to evade the original contractual obligations of the system, and efforts to cut down charges of operation, the costs to the city of running the street car system grows steadily, while the revenues have steadily declined. Nobody has been able thus far to put forward a plan for solution of a problem that is taking on something of the character of a nightmare.

PROBLEMS IN OTHER CITIES.

Seattle is not the only city on the Pacific Coast that finds itself embarrassed on street railway account. The situation in San Francisco has not yet reached the stage of a publicly confessed problem, but it is steadily approaching that status. As yet the municipality owns and operates a relatively limited mileage, but its declared policy looks to taking over several privately owned lines upon the falling in of their franchises.

With the object of running down values of the privately owned lines, powers of the City Government are being used in what to many minds are discreditable means. While elsewhere on the Coast allowance has been made for increased tariffs, in San Francisco the old five-cent rate has been maintained. To meet operating expenses of the municipal system it has been necessary to draw heavily from the sinking funds prescribed in the original plan. Again, political pressure has compelled extensions of the municipal system in non-profitable districts, with a consequent steadily growing loss on operating account.

Here, in the political aspect of the situation, is revealed a special vice which inevitably attends municipal ownership. Outlying districts not sufficiently populous to pay adequately for street railway service, but wherein there is a considerable voting element, are always able to apply a pressure against which official powers are not able to oppose a virtuous resistance.

Up to this time municipal authorities have been able by various tricks of bookkeeping to conceal extravagances and losses and thereby to avoid public scandal, but a showdown must ultimately be demanded, and San Francisco will discover that the deficiencies of her municipally owned system are heavy.

In several of the smaller Coast cities there has been resort to bus service where extensions have been asked for. Notably in Everett on Puget Sound, street car service has been abandoned altogether and tracks have been torn up with substitution of general bus service.

When regularly and sufficiently maintained the service is fairly satisfactory, but in larger cities and during rush hours bus service is invariably inadequate and is provocative of universal condemnation. In cities like Seattle and San Francisco, where grades are difficult, buses are not practicable. Half of the street railway lines both in San Francisco and Seattle must rely permanently either on the cable or some other means not yet invented.

STATE RECORD MADE IN REALTY TURNOVER

Total of $5,500,000,000 for the Fiscal Year Is Figured on Basis of Mortgage Tax Yield.

$13,795,884 IS COLLECTED

Increase of $2,923,745 Is Shown, the Gain in Five Greater New York Counties Being $1,972,781.

Special to The New York Times.

ALBANY, Dec. 11.—A new record in real estate transactions was hung up during the fiscal year which ended June 30, the State Tax Commission announced today in a statement made public by M. F. Loughman, President. The real estate transactions amounted to more than $5,500,000,000, and this total does not include cash transactions in real estate.

The estimate is made on the basis of the legal tax rate of 50 cents on each $100 of the mortgage, and on the assumption that the average mortgage amounts to at least 50 per cent. of the value of the property involved.

The total gross tax collected from July 1, 1925, to June 30, 1926, amounted to $13,795,884.99, and, compared with the $10,872,139.56 of the previous fiscal year, shows an increase of $2,923,745.43. There were 322,633 mortgages recorded in the fiscal year, a gain of 43,361.

While the increases in real estate transactions were general throughout the State, it was noted that there were some decreases in rural communities.

In the five counties of Greater New York the increase in mortgage tax collected amounted to $1,972,781.81, which would indicate that the increase in real estate transactions in which mortgages were involved was at least $80,000,000 more than in the 1924-25 period.

Suffolk County took the lead, the recorded mortgages totaling two and one-half times the amount of the mortgages recorded in the previous year. Suffolk County's gross mortgage tax collected was $228,060.96, as compared to $90,605.09 for the previous year.

Westchester County collected in the last fiscal year $752,558.42, which was $181,292.96 in excess of the 1924-25 collections. Nassau County totaled $723,335.85, which is slightly over 100 per cent. more than the previous year.

After costs of collection had been deducted, a net collection of $13,696,037.38 remained. The State Treasury gets half of this amount and the other half goes to the counties for distribution among tax districts.

The following table gives the mortgage tax statistics of counties where the figures ran highest:

County.	Number of Mortgages Recorded From July 1, 1925, to June 30, 1926.	Gross Tax Collected From July 1, 1925, to June 30, 1926.	Collected From July 1, 1924, to June 30, 1925.

$410,000 IN HOSPITAL FUND.

Lutherans Will Continue Drive Yor $750,000 Another Week.

Last week $180,000 was subscribed toward the Lutheran Hospital Building Fund, E. F. Eilert, General Chairman of the campaign, announced yesterday. Thus far $410,000 has been raised toward the $750,000 sought. The fund is to be used to build at 187th Street and Bennett Avenue, permitting an expansion of the work which is not possible in the converted dwelling houses at 144th Street and Convent Avenue.

The largest gift last week, it is said, was $50,000, made by Ludlow L. Melius, contractor, 790 Riverside Drive. Another gift announced yesterday was $20,000 from the employes of Gristede Brothers, for the establishment and endowment of two beds in the new building. Although the drive was to have concluded on Dec. 10, the organization of 700 volunteers under C. C. Springhorn has decided to continue its efforts for another week, and to make a final report at St. Peter's Church, Fifty-fourth Street and Lexington Avenue, on Dec. 17.

LIFTING INDIAN CONTROL.

Property Restriction on Five Civilized Tribes Ends in 1931.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 11 (AP).—The ending of Federal supervision of Indians is likely to be hastened, it was stated in the annual report today of the Board of Indian Commissioners, which told of plans for reorganization of the Indian field service and of the formation of an Indian medical service. The report observed that the period of restriction on the property of the Cherokee, Creek, Choctaw, Chickasaw and Seminole Indians, known as the five civilized tribes, would end in 1931. It recommended, however, that only Indians under 40 years of age be released from Government guardianship.

A civil service status for the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, instead of a Presidential appointment, was urged in the report.

GETS 350 YEARS IN PRISON.

Albanian Brigand Chief Sentenced —250 Years Each for 19 Others.

PRISREND, Yugoslavia, Dec. 11 (AP). Three hundred and fifty years imprisonment at hard labor, believed to be the longest sentence on record in the Balkans, and nineteen other sentences of 250 years each have been given a leader of a band of Albanian brigands and some of his followers for the murder in 1915 of fourteen Serbian soldiers in a convent near Prisrend.

The leader of the brigands received the longest of the sentences. The Serbs were retreating before the enemy when Albanians, whom they thought friends, entrapped and massacred them.

Wave length 316 Meters — WABC NEW YORK — Wave length 316 Meters

On Friday Evening, December 17th,
The ATLANTIC BROADCASTING CORPORATION
Opens Its New Station with a Program of Distinctive Character

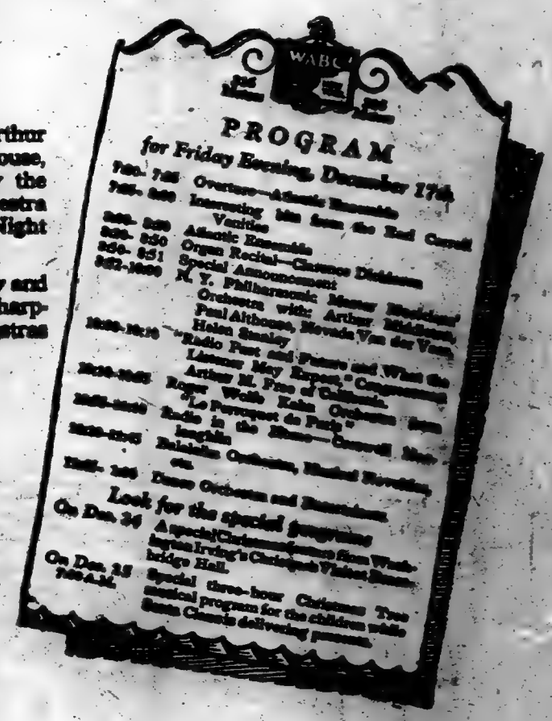
This is the first of a series of splendid programs that this station will broadcast three times a week — Monday, Wednesday and Friday.

IN arranging these programs, we have adopted a method used in editing a high-grade magazine: a variety of features to please all tastes—from novelty and vaudeville to operatic selection—but each number of outstanding character. We still strive for quality rather than quantity.

On the opening night, for example, we shall present the best from Earl Carroll Vanities; then there will be an organ recital by Clarence Dickinson, the well-known organist of the Brick Presbyterian Church; classical and popular selections by the Balalaika (Russian) Orchestra, and the New York Philharmonic Master Musicians' Studio Orchestra.

Interspersed will be numbers by the Grand Opera Quartette: Arthur Middleton, baritone; Nevada Van der Veer, contralto; Paul Althouse, tenor; Helen Stanley, soprano. There will also be solos by the members of this quartette. Roger Wolfe Kahn and his orchestra from Le Perroquet de Paris, New York's latest Society Night Club, will play for those who like the best in dance music.

In coming programs will appear the Barrere Little Symphony and Ensemble, Miss Mildred Dilling, harpist; Mr. Lewis Richards, harpsichordist; eminent singers, violinists, pianists, organists, orchestras and artists from the Philharmonic Society.



The Best Audiences Will Be Attracted by the Distinctive Programs of WABC

Such features will attract the kind of people to whom it is worth while broadcasting and the "ABC Way" will make them receptive. Experience has proven that the best and most popular features on the air are paid for by advertisers. The public now realizes this, and, if a manufacturer's message is properly presented, welcomes it. As all the numbers of WABC's programs, whether sponsored by the station or patrons, will be unusually distinctive, we can ensure their welcome by listeners-in.

The studio is located atop Steinway Hall in New York's musical and artistic center. We thus have every facility for securing the highest grade talent. Special wires are laid direct from the studio to the station on Long Island where the programs are actually put on the air, as explained below.

Reaches Prosperous Families of the Better Class

This station offers to advertisers an opportunity of broadcasting their messages to over 4,500,000 of the most prosperous and receptive people in the richest territory of the United States.

Because of the character of its programs, these desirable people with the proper appreciation of values, and who have money to buy, will be favorably impressed.

1,625,000 Families Have Radio Sets in the ABC Area

WABC reaches the entire Atlantic Seaboard and adjoining states. Yet in the ABC area alone there are over 1,531,000 radio sets. One home in every five is radio-equipped.

Here then is a market unequalled anywhere in the world. Those who own radio sets are prosperous and are wide awake prospects for you. It is conservatively estimated that three people listen in to each set; thus over 4,593,000 listeners can be reached in the ABC Area.

Broadcasting Has Proven an Effective Advertising Medium

During the last year or two a large number of concerns have been broadcasting. The fact that most of them have renewed contracts after a year's trial, proves that broadcasting pays. A well-known tire manufacturer considers it one of the most productive types of publicity used. A trust company holds a similar opinion.

Radio owners are alert people. The sound of the voice is more intriguing than even the written word. Properly presented by your features will be received with interest. They will have the same attention as when placed "next to reading" in magazines and newspapers. In fact, appearing as super-entertainment features, they occupy a position comparable with such preferred locations. Effective as it has proved itself to be, however, broadcasting is not offered as a substitute for the well-tried magazine or newspaper, but as complementary to them.

WABC's Equipment Assures Unusual Reception

The Western Electric Company has supplied WABC with the last word in broadcast equipment. It is a powerful station—5000 watts—and your program will be broadcast with faithful clarity and far-reaching volume.

The actual broadcasting will be done from Richmond Hill, Long Island, away from steel buildings, and from absorbing, distorting conditions.

The advantage of broadcasting from this ideal location rather than from New York City, is very obvious. WABC is heard clearly along the Atlantic Seaboard and especially well in New York, Westchester, New Jersey and Long Island in which there are places that may be "dead spots" for some stations.

One home in every five is radio-equipped

Concentrate Your Appeal in the Richest U. S. Territory—

WABC supplies an influential and an economical means of concentrating your broadcast programs within the most productive market, of which New York City is the main trading center. It includes however, Westchester County and Southern New England, rich sections heretofore difficult to reach with broadcasting, as well as the cities of Boston, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington with the prosperous and populous adjacent territories.

If this area corresponds with that of your business coverage, then you can have no more effective way of talking directly to those you want to pleasantly impress with the worth of your product.

SERMONS TODAY IN CITY'S CHURCHES

Plea to Parents to Bring Their Children Will Be Read From Many Pulpits.

SEVERAL CAROL SERVICES

Christmas to Be a Prevailing Topic —Bishop Murray Will Preach in the Cathedral.

Sermons in preparation for Christmas will be preached in many churches today. In hundreds of pulpits the resolution calling on parents to bring their children to church, written by Supreme Court Justice Thomas C. T. Crain and adopted by the Greater New York Federation of Churches, will be read from the pulpit.

In St. Patrick's Cathedral, at high mass, the Rev. Charles V. Conner, dean of St. Francis Xavier College, will preach on "If Christ Were King, Would You Serve Him?" this being the third of his series of Sunday morning Advent sermons.

"Art Thou He That Should Come, or Do We Look for Another?" will be the subject this morning of a sermon, to be broadcast over Station WRNY, by the Rev. A. Wismar, pastor of St. Matthew's Lutheran Church, Convent Avenue and West 145th Street, the eldest Lutheran church in America.

"The True Meaning of Christmas" will be the theme this morning of the Rev. Dr. A. Edwin Keigwin, pastor of the West End Presbyterian Church, 105th Street and Amsterdam Avenue, which will be broadcast over WAHG. This evening he will preach on "Mary in the Christmas Story."

A Nativity pageant, "The Coming of the Prince of Peace," will be presented this evening at St. Luke's Episcopal Church, Convent Avenue and West 141st Street. There will also be Christmas carols.

"The First Origin of the Western Christmas" will be the subject this morning of the Rev. Dr. William Norman Guthrie, rector of the Episcopal Church of St. Mark's-in-the-Bouwerie, Tenth Street, west of Second Avenue. At 4 o'clock there will be a Robert Browning service in commemoration of the memorial anniversary of the poet. This evening there will be symbolic worship, "The Gift of Holy Fire."

"A Pre-Christmas Admonition" will be the subject this evening of the Rev. Dr. William Carter, pastor of the Throop Avenue Presbyterian Church, at Macon Street, Brooklyn. This morning Dr. Carter will preach on "God's Investigation."

"The Intellectual Preparation of the World for Christ's Coming—Greece," will be the theme this morning of the Rev. De Witt L. Pelton, rector of St. James's Episcopal Church, Jerome Avenue and 190th Street.

The annual Christmas carol service will be held this evening in Immanuel Lutheran Church, Eighty-eighth Street and Lexington Avenue. The Aida Brass Quartet will play, beginning with "Adeste Fidelis."

The Right Rev. John Gardner Murray, Presiding Bishop of the Episcopal Church, will preach at 4 o'clock today in the Cathedral of St. John the Divine at the annual service of the Church Periodical Club of the Episcopal Diocese of New York. This evening Brahms's "Requiem" will be rendered by the vested male choir under Dr. Miles Farrow. This morning the preacher will be the Rev. Dr. Roland Cotton Smith, formerly Rector in Washington, D. C.

The Advent sermons this week each noon in Trinity Episcopal Church, Broadway, at the head of Wall Street, will be preached by the Very Rev. Arthur Dumper, dean of Trinity Episcopal Cathedral, Newark, N. J.

"Eastern Churches in the Western World, a Vital Factor of American Christianity," will be the topic of a different clergyman each day this week at the noon Advent services in St. Paul's Episcopal Chapel, Broadway, between Fulton and Vesey Streets.

The Right Rev. John T. Dallas, Bishop of the Episcopal Diocese of New Hampshire will preach this morning in the chapel of Union Theological Seminary and at 4 o'clock in St. Paul's Chapel, Columbia University.

"An Advent Picture Taken in the Wilderness" will be the topic this morning of the Rev. Dr. Theodore George Hardwig, Pastor of the Lutheran Church of the Atonement, 15 Hamilton Terrace.

The Right Rev. Nathaniel Seymour Thomas, Bishop of the Missionary Episcopal District of Wyoming will preach this morning in St. James's Episcopal Church, Madison Avenue and Seventy-first Street. The preacher at 4 o'clock will be the Very Rev. Owen C. D. Bennett, Dean of the Anglican Cathedral at Nassau, Bahamas, British West Indies.

Dean Bennett will preach this morning in St. George's Episcopal Church, Stuyvesant Square and East Sixteenth Street. At 4 o'clock the Rev. Dr. Karl Reiland, the rector, will preach and the service will be broadcast by WJZ.

"My Reaction to American Lutheranism" will be the topic of a round-table discussion group of St. James's Lutheran Church at 4 o'clock today at 12 East Eighty-sixth Street, the apartment in which the Rev. Dr. William F. Sunday lives.

"Is Methodism in Politics?" will be the topic this evening of the Rev. Dr. Ralph W. Sockman, Pastor of the Madison Avenue Methodist Church at Sixtieth Street. This morning he will preach on "Bridges not Burned."

The Rev. Louis A. Linn, who has come from Saginaw, Mich., where he was pastor of Holy Cross Lutheran Church, will be installed today at 3 o'clock as pastor of Grace Lutheran Church, 199th Street and Valentine Avenue, the Bronx. The Rev. George F. Schmidt, pastor of Immanuel Church, Manhattan, will preach.

Chief Rabbi Maier Shapiro of Pietrokov, a member of the Polish Parliament, will visit this morning the Israel Orphan Asylum, 274 East Second Street.

Loyal Orange Institution, United States of America, will attend this evening the Presbyterian Church of the Good Shepherd, 152 West Sixty-sixth Street, and listen to a sermon by the Rev. F. Raymond Cleo on "Grasping the Essentials."

The entire service this evening will be conducted by six boys representing the Brotherhod of St. Andrew in St. George's Episcopal Church, Gates and Marcy Avenues, Brooklyn. The sermon will be by Harold Smith of St. George's parish.

Bishop S. J. Umbreit will preach this morning in the First Evangelical Church, 424 West Fifty-fifth Street. This is the eighty-sixth anniversary of the church.

The twelfth annual presentation of Bibles from the Alice Davol Memorial Fund will take place this morning in the Unitarian Church of Our Saviour, Pierrepont Street and Monroe Place, Brooklyn. This evening at the forum the Rev. Thomas Turrell of West Somerville, Mass., will speak on "Democracy—Success or Failure."

The sixty-third anniversary will be celebrated today of the Sixty-first Street Methodist Church, 238 East Sixty-first Street, with a sermon this morning by the Rev. Thomas F. Potter of the Upper Iowa Methodist Conference.

In the absence of the Rev. Dr. Harry Emerson Fosdick, the pastor, the preacher this morning in the Park Avenue Baptist Church, at Sixty-fourth Street, will be the Rev. Dr. Cornelius Woelfkin, the senior pastor. This evening Sebastian Matthews's cantata, "The Eve of Grace," will be rendered by the choir.

"Fear of the Unknown" will be the theme at 3:30 this afternoon of the Rev. Dr. Daniel A. Poling, pastor of the Marble Collegiate Reformed Church. The Services, under auspices of the Greater New York Federation of Churches, will be broadcast by WEAF. From 2 to 3 o'clock the federation will broadcast a sermon by the Rev. Wesley Megaw, pastor of Fort Washington Presbyterian Church, on "The Voice of God Today."

Dr. Poling will preach in the Marble Church this morning on "Christ the Ensign," and this evening on "Christ of the Cords."

"Do We Need Religion?" will be the topic this morning of the Rev. Dr. W. Russell Bowie, rector of Grace Episcopal Church, Broadway and Tenth Street. This evening the Rev. C. H. Horner will preach.

The closing service will be held this evening of the mission in Calvary Episcopal Church, Fourth Avenue and Twenty-first Street, in preparation for the Bishops' Crusade. The Rev. Samuel M. Shoemaker Jr. will preach on "Continuing the Christian Life."

SERVICES FOR DR. ELIOT.

Unitarian Laymen's Sunday in Cambridge to Be Devoted to Him.

Special to The New York Times.

CAMBRIDGE, Dec. 11.—On "Laymen's Sunday" in the Unitarian denomination, a memorial service for the late President Emeritus Charles William Eliot of Harvard University will be held at 11 o'clock in the First Parish Church here.

The service will be conducted by the Rev. Francis G. Peabody, class of '69, former Dean of the Harvard Divinity School and brother-in-law of Dr. Eliot, and the Rev. Samuel M. Crothers, '99, assisted by Professor Ephraim Emerton, '71, and Professor W. N. Cole, '90.

The subject of Dr. Peabody's sermon will be "The Religion of Charles William Eliot."

On "Laymen's Sunday" in all Unitarian churches members of the Unitarian Laymen's League take over the services. President Eliot was a regular attendant for more than fifty years of the First Parish Church, which is close to Harvard.

His son, the Rev. Samuel A. Eliot, '84, is President of the American Unitarian Association.

IRON FALCON TO GO HOME.

Iron Relic From Stratford-on-Avon Is Bought in Chicago Sale.

CHICAGO, Dec. 11 (AP).—A rugged iron falcon, taken years ago from the historic old Falcon Inn in Shakespeare's home town of Stratford-on-Avon is to be returned to its native abode after long travel and much handling.

The purchaser was Mrs. Frances H. Leggett of London. Hearing that the relic was for sale as a part of the famous collection of Charles F. Gunther, she hastened to buy it so it might be restored to its place on the front of the inn, not far from her home.

MANNING TO DEDICATE UNIQUE ALTAR CLOTH

100 Bits of Old Lace, Heirlooms in New York Families, Make Up Cathedral Ornament.

Bishop Manning will dedicate a unique altar cloth at the Cathedral of St. John the Divine on Christmas Day. It consists of more than one hundred pieces of old lace, woven together in a mosaic design. The pieces, in various sizes, comprise every variety of hand-made lace, including parts of wedding gowns and veils, wedding handkerchiefs, christening gowns and caps, collars and cuffs, barbs and even flounces from bridal garments. In some cases they are heirlooms of prominent families, handed down through several generations, and therefore invaluable to their owners. The intrinsic value of the altar cloth, which measures 4 feet 9 inches by 2 feet 4 inches, is said to be more than $100,000.

Some of the varieties of lace represented in the cloth are Duchess, Bruges, Burano, Milago Point, Point de Gaze, Point Appliqué, Honiton, Genovese Point, Valenciennes, Venetian Point, Point de Lille, Flanders, Malines, Binche, Point de Paris and Dentelle à la Vierge. The laces came from France, Italy, Belgium and Spain. It would take the lifetime of several expert lacemakers, it is said, to duplicate the work in the cloth.

It took 967 hours to sew the pieces of lace together in mosaic designed by Miss Eloise Zallio, an expert in laces, at her studio at 561 Fifth Avenue. Miss Zallio got the idea from the mosaic decorations in stone in the ancient church at Monreal near Palermo, Italy. She interested several prominent New York women, including Mrs. William H. Sage, Mrs. Henry W. Munroe, Mrs. Haley Fiske and Mrs. Lewis B. Gawtry.

While pieces of rare lace were being gathered from women of the Episcopal Diocese in New York, Miss Zallio made a trip abroad to procure a thread known in France as Couer de Line (heart of the linen), which has not been manufactured since the war. Fully a hundred thousand yards of this thread was used in millions of invisible stitches whereby the hundred pieces of lace were woven together.

DENIAL IN RADIO SUIT.

Grebe Co. Did Not Ask to Have Model Produced in Patent Action.

In its report of the proceedings on Wednesday, Dec. 8, in the United States District Court in Brooklyn, before Judge Grover M. Moscowitz, of litigation between the Haseltine Corporation and A. H. GGrebe, Inc., over a radio patent, THE NEW YORK TIMES told on Thursday, Dec. 10, of the alleged theft of a model of the patent in question and said "the model on which the Grebe Company relied to prove that it had a prior patent was ordered last week to be brought to court."

The Grebe Company says it did not depend on the production of the model to prove its contention and did not ask to have the model produced in court. An investigation of the records of the proceedings before Judge Moscowitz shows that the model was asked for by the Haseltine Corporation and that the Grebe Company had nothing to do with the request for its production in court.

NEW FLIGHT FINANCED.

Plans Are Made for Hop From San Francisco to Honolulu.

SAN FRANCISCO, Dec. 11 (AP).—The Chronicle says financial arrangements were completed here last night for a non-stop flight from San Francisco to Honolulu under the auspices of the National Aeronautical Association's local organization.

This will be an effort to carry out as a "sporting proposition" the undertaking of the navy in the Fall of 1925, when the late Lieut. Commander John Rodgers set out with two planes, both of which fell short of the 2,380-mile hop. Commander Rodgers and the crew of his plane drifted helplessly for days before being picked up.

C. K. Vance, veteran wartime flier of the air mail service, has been chosen chief pilot, and the flight is to be made in a specially constructed plane. It is planned to make the dash "from noon to noon," flying at the rate of 100 miles an hour. A land plane will be used.

George H. Fairchild Contends Constitution Gives No Power to Alienate Sovereignty.

...VES RARE OLD RECORDS

...ia Convention of 1788 Named Purpose of States to Reserve Right.

By RUSSELL B. PORTER.

...ther Congress has the constitutional power to grant independence to the Philippine Islands is a comparatively new issue which has been raised in the discussion of the Philippines question. Judge Daniel R. Williams, who was Secretary to the Taft commission in the islands, recently published a brief in The Virginia Law Review and later in the Congressional Record holding that no power was granted in Congress to alienate sovereignty over any territory of the United States.

...o years have been devoted to a study of this theory by George H. Fairchild, one of the leading retentionists among the American residents of the islands. He has large sugar-producing interests in the Philippines and in Hawaii, is an active member of the anti-independence American Chamber of Commerce in Manila and until recently owned and published The Manila Times. He insists that Congress cannot grant independence to the Philippines without a mandate from the people in the form of a constitutional amendment giving to it power to alienate sovereignty and argues that the United States has never ceded sovereignty over any territory belonging to it.

During the visit of Colonel Carmi A. Thompson to the Philippines last summer to investigate conditions for President Coolidge, Mr. Fairchild expounded his non-alienation theory at length to Colonel Thompson and to the latter, who accompanied the President's representative as correspondent for THE NEW YORK TIMES.

Mr. Fairchild bases his case largely upon the debates at the Constitutional Convention in Virginia in 1788, which ratified the Constitution of the United States after prolonged arguments regarding the extent of the powers to be delegated to the Federal Government by the various States.

Finds Rare Record.

"I spent some time in the New York Public Library a year ago searching old records," said Mr. Fairchild, "and was interested in finding what I was looking for in a copy of the second edition of the 'Debates and Other Proceedings' of the Convention of Virginia, published in 1805. This record is so rare that it is not even referred to in Elliott's 'Debates,' and is unknown to all save in Max Farrand's history. The record of the debates, as set forth in its foreword, was compiled from stenographic notes taken by David Robertson, probably the only record taken by a stenographer of the debates in the several States at the time the Constitution of the United States was under consideration, as stenographers were not plentiful in those days.

"Many authorities seek through implied, resultant, inherent and other powers as well as the welfare clauses to give Congress the power to alienate sovereignty, justifying their opinions regarding acquisitions of territory solely on such specific power to that effect exists in the Constitution. It is quite clear from reading this record as to the disposition of the fundamental rights of the American people that it was the intention of the people solely responsible for the Constitution that Congress was to be restricted to the exercise of delegated powers as in a board of directors of a company or corporation.

"While Congress was delegated the express powers to do those things which are necessary for the conduct of a company's current business affairs, when it came to the alienation of the assets, the stockholders, namely, the States, reserved the right to give their approval."

Quotes From Virginia Debate.

"The honorable gentleman says there are only three rights stipulated in it. I thought this error might have been accounted for at first; but after he read it, the continuance of the mistake has astonished me. He has wandered from the point. Where in this paper do you discover that the people of Virginia are tenacious of three rights only? It declares "that all power comes from the people, and that whatever is not granted by them remains with them"; that among other things remaining with them are liberty of the press, right of conscience and some other essential rights. Could you devise any express form of words by which the rights contained in the bill of rights of Virginia could be better secured or more fully comprehended? What is the paper which he offers in the form of a bill of rights? Will that better secure our rights than a declaration like this? All rights are therein declared to be completely vested in the people, unless expressly given away. Can there be more pointed or positive reservation?

From Page 246, Madison speaking:

"I readily confess that neither the old Confederation nor the new Constitution involves a right to give up the navigation of the Mississippi. It is repugnant to the law of nations. I have always thought and said so. Although the right be desired, there may be emergencies which will make it necessary to make a sacrifice. But there is a material difference between emergencies of safety in time of war and those which may relate to mere commercial regulations. You might on solid grounds deny in time of peace what you give up in time of war.

"It will, moreover, be contrary to the law of nations to relinquish territorial rights. To make a treaty to alienate any part of the United States will amount to a declaration of war against the inhabitants of the alienated part and a general absolution from allegiance. They will never abandon this great right.

From page 355:

"The King of Great Britain has the power of making peace, but he has no power of dismembering the empire nor alienating any part of it. Nay, the King of France has no right of alienating any part of his dominions to any power whatsoever. The power of making treaties does not involve a right of dismembering the Union.

From page 368:

"I do not conceive that power is given to the President and Senate to dismember the empire or to alienate any great essential right. I do not think the whole legislative authority have this power. The exercise of this power must be consistent with the object of the delegation.

Quotes From Constitution.

"Article I of the Constitution," Mr. Fairchild continued, "states that all legislative powers 'herein granted' shall be vested in the Congress of the United States. While there are twenty-six grants of power in the Constitution and thirty-one prohibitions and restrictions, there is nothing in the Constitution giving Congress the power either to acquire or alienate, and the record of the Virginia Convention is the best evidence in the case to support the statement that many of the persons who were responsible for the Constitution had no intention of giving to Congress the power to alienate the sovereignty over any territory or rivers belonging to the United States.

"One cannot read the complete record of the Virginia Convention without realizing the reasons for the failure of the amendment which was proposed by the so-called Tory faction to give Congress the power to alienate sovereignty.

"The reasons for the defeat of most of the suggested amendments in the first session of Congress in 1789 are not a matter of dependable record, owing to inadequate reports; but from information gleaned here and there it is quite evident that of all of the amendments suggested by the Virginia Convention, only eight were accepted, most of them sponsored by Madison, taken particularly from the compilation made by George Wythe of Virginia, while the Seventh Amendment of the original twenty, which was designed to give Congress the power to alienate the Mississippi River and the contiguous lands, as planned by the so-called Tory element, was defeated, and in order that there should never be any question as to whether or not Congress could exercise this power, new Amendments, IX and X, were passed."

At this point Mr. Fairchild quoted the following excerpt from the Virginia Convention record:

"* * * Of all the amendments, this is the most destructive, which requires the consent of three-fourths of both houses to treaties ceding or restraining rights. This is priding in the Virginia sovereignty in opposition to the majority. This suspected Congress—these corrupt 65, and corrupt 25, are brought so low they cannot be trusted, lest they should have it in their power to lop off part of Virginia, cede it, so as that it should become a colony to some foreign State. There is no power in the Constitution to cede any part of the territories of the United States. The whole number of Congress, being unanimous, have no power to suspend or cede territorial rights. But this amendment admits in the fullest latitude that Congress have a right to dismember the empire.

Compares Mississippi and Philippines.

"The anxiety to which the people of Virginia and other States gave expression when the attempt was made by the Confederation to alienate the Mississippi River to Spain for a period of twenty-five years, incidentally alienating the control of the Western lands, so dramatically featured throughout the Virginia debates, was inspired by the same motives and reasons that actuate many Americans in their opposition to the withdrawal of the sovereignty over the Philippines by Congress without a mandate from the people, because of their conception of their duty to themselves and those for whom the United States has assumed obligations.

"The Mississippi River and the Western lands in those days were as far, if not further, from Washington than the Philippine Islands are today, and the future of the trade of the Pacific Ocean is fully as important as were the potentialities of the commerce of the Mississippi River and the development of the Western lands.

"Having but recently emerged from a war with Great Britain for their independence, the thirteen original States sensed the danger of alienating the Mississippi River, even for a period of twenty-five years, because of the fear expressed by Patrick Henry and others that at the end of that time foreign monarchical Governments would be so securely established on that river and the Western lands and 'back lands' contiguous thereto that they would not be able to dislodge them; that the independence for which they had fought would be lost, and that the American Continent would become the centre of intrigue of the commercial, political and religious jealousies of foreign powers, as is Europe to this day.

"Patrick Henry and others predicted that Congress would invoke the power through implication as a justification for its right to alienate, but believed it was forestalled by the Ninth and Tenth Amendments.

"The doubts raised by the foregoing evidence are worthy of careful study and consideration by every member of Congress, when it is urged to commit itself to the unwarranted usurpation of a power which failed to receive the sanction of the founders of the Constitution."

ROSE STOLL BRIDE OF T. R. LOUNSBURY

Bishop Stires, Assisted by Dr. Brooks, Performs Ceremony in St. Thomas's Chapel.

ALLETTA B. POST MARRIES

Wed to John T. McMahon by Bishop Walsh at Home of Her Godmother, Mrs. J. M. Bailey.

Miss Rose Alberta Stoll, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Henry Stoll of Hollis, L. I., was married to Theodore Roosevelt Lounsbury, son of Mrs. Theodore Lounsbury and the late Mr. Lounsbury of Astoria, L. I., yesterday afternoon in St. Thomas's Chapel, 230 East Sixtieth Street. The ceremony was performed by the Right Rev. Ernest M. Stires, Bishop of Long Island, assisted by the Rev. Dr. Roelif H. Brooks, the new rector of St. Thomas's, and the Rev. Richard M. Doubs, vicar of the chapel.

The wedding music was by Dr. T. Tertius Noble, organist of St. Thomas's Church, and by the chapel's choir and part of the choir of the church.

Miss Edna Stoll, sister of the bride, was maid of honor. The other attendants were Mrs. John Dowd, another sister of the bride; the Misses May Larkin, Mabel Screvane and Eleanor Dewdney. Dorothy Cole was the flower girl and Henry Dowd the page.

George Lounsbury, brother of the bridegroom, was the best man. The ushers were John Dowd, John Stoll, uncle of the bride; Henry Walen, George Meudt, Arthur Scott and William Bothner. The ceremony was followed by a reception at the Chalet in Long Island City.

There was a guard of honor in full uniform from the Seventy-first Regiment, the bridegroom having served during the World War with Company K in France.

Mr. Lounsbury and his bride will go to Atlantic City on their wedding trip and on their return will live in Astoria.

McMahon—Post.

Miss Alletta Bayley Post, daughter of Mrs. Henry Chester Hepburn of Babylon, L. I., and the late Richard Bayley Post, was married to John Timothy McMahon, son of the late John Timothy McMahon of this city, yesterday afternoon at the home of her godmother, Mrs. James Muhlenberg Bailey, 1,015 Park Avenue. The ceremony was performed by the Right Rev. Thomas J. Walsh, Bishop of Trenton, N. J., assisted by Mgr. W. J. McKeon, before a temporary altar which had been erected at one end of the ballroom against a background of cybotium ferns and palms. Governor Alfred E. Smith and his staff were among the guests.

The bride, who is a direct descendant of Dr. Richard Bayley, the first physician of the Port of New York, was escorted by her maternal uncle, James H. Strong. She wore a gown of ivory colored satin embellished with old pointe d'Alençon lace, which had been in her family for many generations. The skirt was finished with deep flounces of the lace and her veil of the same beautiful lace had been worn by her mother and grandmother when brides.

Mrs. George C. T. Remington of Philadelphia was matron of honor, and Miss Mary Arden Schroeder of Flushing, cousin of the bride, was maid of honor. They wore frocks of bois de rose chiffon embellished with self colored velvet. Their picture hats matched their frocks. Miss Leta Morris, another cousin of the bride, and Miss Florence McMahon, sister of the bridegroom, were bridesmaids. Their frocks were of jade green chiffon embellished with self-colored velvet, and they were hats to correspond.

Seth Thayer of Port Washington was best man for Mr. McMahon, whose ushers were T. Bulkley Morrissey, Clarence A. Earle Jr., William V. Griffin of New York and John K. Dougherty of Portland, Ore.

Invitations to the ceremony were limited to members of the immediate families, but a few extra guests were asked to the small reception which followed.

A NEWSPAPER FILE

that will last indefinitely!

"The yesterday of today was the today of yesterday—so smoothly run the courses of nature that all unnoticed present news merges into past history."

COMMENCING January 1, 1927, The New York Times will print a number of copies of its Daily and Sunday issues on pure rag paper stock in order that the printed record of the day's news may be preserved against the deterioration which takes place in the print paper made of wood fibers now generally in use.

These permanent records will be bound (two volumes to each month) and sold to Libraries, Institutions, Corporations, and individuals for $170.00 per year. (Delivered in the United States.)

The New York Times

The only newspaper index in the United States published continuously since 1913. A new volume is published every three months. The contents form an alphabetical list of newspaper references, indexed by subjects and names fully cross-referenced to persons and related events. Following the subject is a brief summary of the news reports with dates of publication, page and column notations.

As news is published the same day in most all daily newspapers, the date guides one to similar and supplemental information in other newspapers, periodicals, clipping files and reference sources. For general reference The Index gives complete information without recourse to newspaper files.

The New York Times Index is now the standard newspaper reference in all classes of libraries all over the world. It is invaluable to every one who needs to refer to newspaper files.

THE NEW WATCHWORD.

Not so long ago the favorite motto in the British Empire was "Efficiency." Lord ROSEBERY, when Prime Minister, used to ring the changes on it. But a new note was sounded at the recent Imperial Conference. There was a special subcommittee on "Research." Lord BALFOUR was the Chairman of it, and he made a report quite in the spirit of some of Secretary HOOVER'S pleas for the endowment of pure science in American laboratories and universities. Lord BALFOUR remarked that there is no way of anticipating the rise of some great scientific genius, but the thing to do, when he has arrived, is to give him full scope and every possible assistance that he may require. Then little by little the application of his discoveries to industry may be made in one branch after another. For the empire, the particular importance of this kind of work lies in the interchange of ideas and the cooperation which might easily be made possible. To keep researchers in touch with each other and familiar with the results that are being attained at different centres of investigation, means that a great deal of overlapping and wasted energy would be prevented. This appeal and program within the British Empire cannot fail to be of interest to Americans who also are asked to press forward in the name of scientific research and scientific cooperation.

LOSING FAITH IN THE DIRECT PRIMARY.

Senator DILL of the State of Washington, in attacking in advance the credentials of Mr. VARE of Pennsylvania and Mr. SMITH of Illinois, was forced to take cognizance of the fact that both these gentlemen were the choice of the voters in a direct Senatorial primary. The corruption notorious in that process was the very thing that the direct primary was intended to make impossible. As Senator DILL innocently said, "Those who led the movement for the "adoption of the direct primary some "years ago believed that it would end "that practice"—meaning the control of elections by big business and bosses through the use of money. The event has made a sardonic comment upon this credulous hope. As the Senator from Washington was forced to concede, we have lately been seeing "some of the "most flagrant examples of the violation of the spirit and purpose of the "primary in the history of American "politics."

Such utterances, along with the decision of the Senate committee to probe deeper into the Pennsylvania and Illinois primaries, lend special significance to an article in the December number of The American Federationist on "The Use of the Direct Primary." It is written by Professor BOOTS of the University of Pittsburgh, and is given first place in this organ of the American Federation of Labor. The author has long studied the theory and working of the direct primary, and while he does not abandon its principle, or entirely surrender the hopes that were entertained at the time of its establishment, he makes a searching criticism of its operation. He shows how the percentage of qualified voters taking part in it has steadily been growing smaller. He admits that it tends to break down party responsibility, and shows that in experience this new-fangled piece of political machinery, designed to put the professional politicians out of business, has in reality proved to be only one more efficient instrument in their hands. If the direct primary does not work well, it is mainly because the party bosses are so easily able to "work" it for their own selfish interests.

Professor BOOTS is clearly of the mind that the time has come to revise our opinions of the direct primary, and thoroughly to overhaul it if it is ever to be made an available means of improving the Government. The first step is to get rid entirely of the notion that it is a kind of automatic device for purifying politics. People have thought of it as if it would do things very much after the manner of a witch-doctor or a rain-maker. Under the pretense of giving more power to the voters, it has really confused and misled them. For one thing it demands too much of them. They cannot give the time or skill to making the direct primary serve, which the gods of the machine can always do. In sober fact, the direct primary has, while professing to give the average citizen more political influence, really lessened what he had before. This is on the principle laid down by the late H. J. FORD, who said, "Whatever pur-"ports to give to the people a power "which they cannot exercise, in reality "takes it away from them." The conclusion reached by Professor BOOTS is that, without the accompaniment of the short ballot and the merit system of appointment to office, the direct primary will be an increasing failure.

AN EPIC OF RECONSTRUCTION.

On Wednesday the Zaimis Coalition Government at Athens received a virtually unanimous vote of confidence from the newly elected Parliament. The Government's program stresses the exclusion of the army from politics, a pacific foreign policy and the restoration of full parliamentary liberties. There is good reason for hoping that Greece has at last pulled her feet out of the mire of foreign adventure, defeat, civil war, militarism and dictatorship. A heartening page in contemporary history has been written by General KONDYLIS, who made such short shrift of the serio-comic PANGALOS. In the tradition of the old Roman patriotism KONDYLIS contented himself with setting in order the Greek political house and retiring from the scene.

It is the protracted turmoil and strife at Athens that has obscured from the eyes of the world an extraordinary effort at national reconstruction which redounds to the honor of the Greek people and to the League of Nations, an active partner in the great work. The antics of the military chieftains have shoved out of the news the story of the Refugee Settlement. It is now told in detail in a report of the Settlement Commission to the League of Nations. Briefly, it is the story of how a country of 5,000,000 people in the space of three years has absorbed into itself 1,400,000 fugitive kinsmen. In absolute numbers this is as great a folk migration as any in European history. Proportionately, it is as if the United States in the space of three years were asked to provide home and occupation for 35,000,000 immigrants.

To cope with the immediate problem the American Red Cross stepped in and fed half a million people for six months. Then the Near East Relief took up the work and has continued to care for the orphans. British agencies participated. NANSEN'S report to the League prepared the way for the guaranteed loan of $50,000,000 to the Athens Government (a part of which the Greeks themselves subscribed), and the Settlement Commission was organized.

By July 1 of the present year the commission had planted more than 147,000 refugee families on the land, a total of 552,000 individuals. It built for them more than 40,000 houses. The Turks had left behind 65,000 habitations. The Greek Government gave for settlement more than 1,500,000 acres of land, of which two-thirds had been vacated by the Turks, and another 10 per cent. was secured by expropriation. Macedonia took 116,400 families, Thrace 16,600, Crete nearly 5,000. Homes and a living were thus provided for all the farmer refugees and from 15 to 25 per cent. of those who had been townsfolk in Asia Minor. Originally the commission's concern was with the agricultural element and it has remained that in the main. But the urban population had to be looked after. The commission built 16,700 apartments in Athens and the provincial towns. The Greek Government erected more than 23,000 homes all over the country. At Athens, Piraeus, Salonika, entire new districts and suburbs have been created, new towns virtually, with populations from 20,000 to 30,000. In Macedonia 300,000 urban refugees have established themselves.

The strain on the old population has been heavy. Work for the newcomers came originally from the vast home-building programs. Now the Government plans extensive public works. After that there will be difficulties. But there seems no doubt that the problem of fitting three-quarters of a million new industrial workers into the old economic scheme will be solved. One ancient problem has already been solved. Macedonia, so long an ethnic crazy quilt and a shambles, has been thoroughly Hellenized.

A BIRTHDAY.

Twenty-five years ago today the letter "s," ticked on a telegraph instrument at Cornwall, England, was received by WILLIAM MARCONI on the coast of Newfoundland. It was the birth of what the world has now known for many years as wireless telegraphy. The young Italian had experimented on the coast of the Mediterranean, he had reported without wires yacht races in New York Bay, but the receipt of that one letter proved to him that the curvature of the earth could be overcome and that wireless telegraphy through thousands of miles of space waited only on experimentation and development.

Both followed quickly. Three months later, during a voyage to the United States, he received complete messages up to 1,500 miles. A year later private messages passed regularly from one side of the Atlantic to the other. Balloons and kites for the support of aerials disappeared. Stations with lofty masts took their places. Soon wireless messages from Nantucket Lightship told of ships to be seen and "Passed Fire Island" was no longer necessary. Only three years after the coming of the letter "s" THE NEW YORK TIMES received the news of the Russian-Japanese naval battle off Port Arthur by wireless, from 150 miles at sea to the cable at Wei-Hai-Wei. MARCONI worked with vision and zeal, on both sides of the Atlantic, and three years later, in 1907, he was ready.

THE NEW YORK TIMES had followed the development of this new marvel with interest and encouragement from its beginnings. The part it played in its development will ever be of deep gratification to it. On Oct. 17, 1907, the first commercial message accepted for transmission was filed for THE NEW YORK TIMES. It was the forerunner of thousands of words that were to follow during the night, among them a greeting from CLEMENCEAU, then Premier of France. New York City and the whole nation experienced a thrill the next day. The success of wireless telegraphy was demonstrated beyond question. It was not perfect. There were delays, confusions. Cable officials, many of them, were skeptical, cynical.

But THE TIMES continued to receive much of its news by wireless despite uncertainties and interruptions, thousands of words coming, every week, through the air from Clifden to Glace Bay, Nova Scotia. In 1912 THE TIMES discovered that much of the delay in transmission was between London and Clifden on the other side, and between Glace Bay and New York on this side. It quickly corrected faults in overland transmission, and from that time on wireless telegraphy was a success. Improvements and developments were constant, and for many years now THE TIMES has had its own receiving station in its building.

It should be recalled that it was in the year 1912 that wireless telegraphy rendered a service to humanity that evoked the acclaim and admiration of the entire world—its vital part in the Carpathia's rescue of large numbers of the drifting and sinking passengers and crew of the Titanic. What wireless telegraphy has meant, since that year, in aiding to make the seas safer and in the dissemination of information over their broad expanses is too well known to require elaboration. Today, still in his vigorous prime, MARCONI looks forward. He has recently established short-wave stations which are to be of great importance in wireless communication. He foresees the possibility of wireless transmission of power over moderate distances and the possibility that television may become an actuality. He believes that the next twenty-five years may witness further great development in directional wireless transmission and reception. This day marks a quarter century of high achievement by him. He has the gratitude of the whole world and its hopes that his future efforts may be crowned with success in full measure.

SAVING MAD RIVER NOTCH.

Mad River Notch is off the beaten track in New Hampshire. Its primeval forest of red spruce is known only to the neighborhood and to the more hardy among Summer hikers. Its isolation has saved it from destruction in the past. It may serve to save it in the future despite the fact that it was bought last year by a lumber company prepared to build a railroad and cut this last stand of virgin timber in the White Mountains. Sixteen thousand acres, more or less, of splendid forest may be preserved if only prompt action is taken. The slopes of Mount Osceola and Kankamaugus, lying between the President and the Franconia Ranges, are dense with stately spruce trees. The bottom land has a thick stand of hardwood. The plot is crowned with the Greeley Ponds, which have been described as lying like two gentians open to the sky.

With a fine public spirit the lumber company that now owns this tract of land has responded to the appeals of such associations as the Appalachian Mountain Club, the New Hampshire State Chamber of Commerce, the Massachusetts Forestry Association and the Chambers of Commerce of Springfield and New Haven, and has let it be known that it is willing to sell this area as a national forest for the equivalent of the purchase price plus interest. It is understood that if a bill now pending in Congress to appropriate $2,000,000 for the purchase of lands protecting the watersheds of navigable rivers is passed, a portion will be turned over for the acquisition of Mad River Notch as a national forest. President COOLIDGE in his message has recommended the passage of this bill and has expressed the hope that an additional million dollars may be provided in special appropriations.

It is scarcely a hundred years since the White Mountain country was almost all virgin forest. The first who went into it to live were pioneers who preferred it to the alluring Western lands then being thrown open. They were followed by lumber companies. Today the spruces of Mad River Notch constitute the only important stand of virgin timber that has survived. Its historical value is great. A relic of the forest primeval, its worth a hundred years hence will be greater even than it is today, and those who take part in saving it for the ages will receive the blessings of unborn generations.

This Winter the heavy snows will weigh down the soft branches of the spruces, as it has done for centuries past. But unless Congress provides the funds and the property is soon acquired another Winter's snows may lie on shorn stumps and slashed limbs, while the sawmills twang their triumph as they eat the giant trees. Mad River Notch should be saved. Surely this bit of original forest deserves to be kept so that many Winters' snows and the rains of countless Springs may fall upon it, and the generations to come may understand what the wilderness was like which once blanketed nearly all of New England.

THE MOTOR CAMPER.

Persons who can afford to take a Rolls-Royce view of the world have compared the interminable procession of our migrants on wheels and the motor camps for their temporary settlement to the invasions of the barbarians. According to the American Automobile Association, there are 12,000,000 of these travelers. We have long regarded them as seekers and finders of a valuable form of liberal culture. They meet all kinds of Americans, except the purpler sort. They see the country more at leisure than their brethren who turn up noses at them. If often they look dusty and shabby, they are daily sloughing off provincialism and learning something from and of the people, the "common" and mostly friendly people of forty-eight States. They lose the urbanite's distrust of strangers. They acquire the art of easy intimacy, which is essentially American, though often too hastily ascribed to Western Americans alone.

The Automobile Association reckons the motor camper's expenses at $10 a day and car, when he is "on the road." That is a good deal more than was spent by a philosopher one remembers in Arizona. He introduced himself with perfect simplicity. He had a good business somewhere in Oklahoma. It struck him one day that he was getting near his thirties. "The time to travel is when you're young enough to enjoy it." Besides, his wife and three "kids" had never seen the sea or the mountains. So he sold out his business and was going to "Ford and camp it" until his people got tired. He could always make a living. He bought his own food and cooked it; and reckoned his daily expenses at $3. He was a little fluent with geological terms, probably derived from some "folder," but he knew how to pronounce them. In short, he was a perfectly well-bred, ingenuous, healthy American, eplarging his education.

Closet observers wail that all Americans are alike. When we have seen the other 11,999,999 we may believe it. In World's Work, Mr. FREDERIC F. VAN DE WATER, speaking from rich experience, confirms our theory of "The Education of the Tin-Can Tourist." In one journey three New Yorkers > met men, women and children from forty States. Beside flickering campfires we talked for hours with cowboys, sailors, soldiers, mechanics, small merchants and farmers. We dwelt with them for thirty-seven days. In each motor camp, when tents had been pitched and dishes washed, the temporary inhabitants strolled about from tent-fly to tent-fly, talking with a lack of formality or self-consciousness that seemed to us the perfection of gentility. All the awkward preliminaries of acquaintanceship were wiped away by a common enterprise. If, by chance, you camped for a second time with a family, you hailed each other like friends of a lifetime.

The campers were honest, clean of person and speech, "considerate, hospitable, helpful," gay, humorous. "We learned "much of the life history, the problems "and aspirations of them all." Pretty much everything was talked about, except politics. That seems a little curious. If fifty or more American tourists can live together thirty-seven days or thirty-seven hours without animated discussion of "TEDDY" ROOSEVELT and WILSON some sudden inhibition has seized the gods of the car; and if "Well, New York, you're a long ways from home" be the mystic greeting to the roamer from Manhattan, he is likely to be quietly approached by somebody from Oregon or Wisconsin or where not, bound to get an opinion about "AL" SMITH. However that may be, this traveling school of 12,000,000 is our greatest university. It gives courses in geography, sociology, psychology, democracy and much else.

"Seeing Americans" is a good deal more filling, instructive and better fun than "seeing America."

THE FAMOUS ONEIDAS.

Outside of Boston how many know that GERRITT SMITH MILLER invented modern football? A historical sketch of "The Oneida Football Club of Boston" has been deposited in the archives of the Massachusetts Historical Society. The author is WINTHROP SALTONSTALL SCUDDER, one of the original members of the club. "Why was it," it has been asked, "that the Oneida Football Club not only "never was beaten but that its goal "never was crossed?" The answer:

> It was because "GAT" MILLER and "CLIFF" WATSON sat up nights working out the formations and stratagems of play on the field. They were pioneers in the art, which has now become so complicated and so popular.

WALTER CAMP and PARKE H. DAVIS have both testified that the Oneida of Boston was the first football club ever organized on a permanent basis. In a letter to Mr. SCUDDER, dated April 26, 1926, Mr. DAVIS wrote:

> In the deluge which poured down at the Harvard-Yale game at Cambridge in 1924 the spectacle of you yourself in a coonskin coat, standing on the side lines and with your eighty years defying, like Ajax, the rain, the hail, the thunder and lightning, was the most inspiring sight I have seen in forty years of football.

Seven members of the Oneida Club, which vanquished all comers in the '60s, were photographed at the monument to the club erected by the City of Boston in 1925. The names of those heroes, whose average of years was eighty, were: GERRITT SMITH MILLER, founder and captain; EDWARD LINCOLN ARNOLD, EDWARD BOWDITCH, ROBERT MEANS LAWRENCE, JAMES DE WOLF LOVETT, FRANCIS GREENWOOD PEABODY and WINTHROP SALTONSTALL SCUDDER. Yet The Boston Daily Advertiser gave only a five-line notice to the game, which was played on Nov. 7, 1863.

The Oneida was the pioneer of the thousands of clubs that now attract their millions every Autumn throughout the United States. It was made up from boys of Dixwell's, the Boston Public Latin and the Boston English High Schools. On Nov. 7, 1923, a tablet to honor Captain MILLER was dedicated at the Noble and Greenough School, Dedham. This school is "a direct descendant" of Dixwell's. Dr. CHARLES W. ELIOT, a pupil of Mr. DIXWELL in 1848-9, spoke at the exercises, and so did Bishop WILLIAM LAWRENCE, a member of the Oneida Football Club. It also included HENRY CABOT LODGE, ARTHUR SHERBURNE HARDY, HENRY PARKMAN and ROGER WOLCOTT.

"Here in the United States," says Mr. SCUDDER, "organized football was played "on Boston Common in 1862 by the "Oneida Club, made up of schoolboys, "seven years before it was played by "Rutgers and Princeton and thirteen "years before the first game between "Harvard and Yale." The Boston Common brand of football was conducive to longevity. No sturdier group of old young men than the seven assembled about the Oneida football monument could be seen the world over.

NOT FEAST AND FAMINE.

The Neediest Cases for which help is asked are the most distressed that are known to the great charitable organizations cooperating in this appeal, and the relief that is given for this fund is not a feast followed by a famine, but steady, persevering assistance, meeting all the needs of the afflicted family and aiming at its complete rehabilitation. The unfortunates are fed, clothed and housed. The sick are cared for. Latent earning capacity is developed. Not only are their immediate needs met, but destitute families are aided and encouraged in every way in working out their own future.

In one case long hospital or sanitarium care must be given to the father, mother or child. In another case the relief must begin with a long rest for an overworked, worn-out mother. Widows and children, weakened and emaciated from months or years of undernourishment, are provided with proper food in ample quantities. Families living in overcrowded, dark, insanitary quarters are moved to better surroundings. In two cases, for instance, widows and children are living in huts on city dumps. Decent places to live in will be provided for them.

Careful diagnosis is made and skillful treatment given in the case of every patient among the Neediest Cases. Some must have operations immediately. Others require prolonged medical attention. Through preventive medicine neglected children get a chance to grow up strong and well. Braces, crutches or special shoes are provided for cripples from poliomyelitis, hip disease and other ailments. The sunshine treatment and special diets are provided for children threatened with tuberculosis.

The future of each family is never lost sight of. The blind are taught trades at schools for the blind. Men who, weakened by disease, can no longer do heavy physical labor, are re-educated in occupations suitable for them. Sons and daughters who are growing up are taught trades, so that they can begin earning the best possible wages as soon as they are old enough to be permitted by law to leave school. Self-respect and independence are encouraged in every possible way, and pauperization is avoided.

In some cases boys and girls in orphan asylums are praying to be allowed to return to their mothers and sisters and brothers. Contributions to the Neediest Cases will grant their prayers. In other cases mothers and children, bereft and penniless, are aghast at the danger that they may have to be parted. No greater tragedy can befall a mother whose life is wrapped up in her children. No greater cruelty can be inflicted on a child. Many heart-breaking separations, now impending, can be averted by contributions.

The Neediest Cases speak for themselves. The only appeal is through the publication of their stories. Help must come to them from readers whose hearts are touched. There is no personal solicitation. Offers of benefit performances and of the donation of personal services have been made by generous friends of the Neediest Cases, but have been declined, to avoid any change in the character of the appeal. Its success in the past has been due to the compassion and pity which have been aroused by the tragic stories.

The Neediest Cases have won personal friends and benefactors whose interest never dies. The public is enlightened concerning distress which is too easily lost sight of. The modern war on poverty is dramatically pictured, and new backers and helpers are brought to the support of the great charitable organizations which are systematically waging this war. One after another the most pitiful cases will be relieved as contributions come in. As each of these cases is provided for, the burden on the means of the charitable organizations is lessened and they will be able to help other cases more adequately.

There is a Christmas atmosphere about gifts for the Neediest Cases. Santa Claus is no myth here. Contributions send him into the saddest and most afflicted homes in New York with gifts of immeasurable value. His pack does not contain the usual assortment of Christmas gifts. It has no toys and luxurious and pretty remembrances. But it contains life for those in danger of dying from neglect and anxiety, homes for mothers and children in danger of losing them, a renewal of family life and love for children in orphan asylums, health and hope and a chance for the future.

BY-PRODUCTS

From The Popular Science Monthly's symposium of forecasts for the year 1927 it appears that we may expect improved varieties of food plants and lighter automobiles with much higher speed. The chances of survival for the average pedestrian would thus seem to be about what they are now. He will have more to eat, but he will be run down oftener.

One scientific achievement to which we may look forward in 1927 but not mentioned in The Science Monthly symposium is the discovery of a certain cure for insomnia. Victims of the disease will be appointed to positions as watchmen at Long Island Railroad crossings.

Giant Power.

It is impossible even to summarize the problem of Power Development in New York State without entering, to some extent, into technicalities. To begin with, it should be recalled that the State of New York contains within its boundaries a seemingly inexhaustible store of electric energy popularly described as Superpower or Smith Power. Well-known Republican engineers like Colonel Roosevelt, Mr. Ogden Mills and Mr. Samuel Koenig, who have looked into the proposition, have ascertained that this Smith Power is capable of developing several hundred quadrillions of foot-pounds of kick twenty-four hours in the day and 365 days in the year except in leap years, when the yield is proportionately higher.

Strenuous efforts to dam up and control Smith Power within the boundaries of Greater New York and the up-State cities for the purpose of feeding the Republican State Utilities have resulted in serious casualties among the construction personnel. The outlook is that future Republican technicians for the job will have to be recruited by draft. In the vicinity of the St. Lawrence and the Niagara River the problem of Smith Power is somewhat less hazardous, because in those regions the news that the Civil War is over has just begun to permeate. But even up-State it is a fact that licenses and leases to Republican candidates for office are issued with a cancellation option to the licensee in case Smith decides to run again. It is a serious problem. The Republican engineers and road gangs have been warned that if they fail to establish control over the Smith Power in New York it will spill over beyond State boundaries and electrify the rest of the United States.

Against the last contingency, however, it has been proposed in some Republican quarters to invoke the Baumes law against Al Smith. Having been elected Governor for the fourth time, he should be sentenced to Albany for life.

Our Own Questionnaire.

(Answer Yes or No. Solution of yesterday's cross-word puzzle will be found on Page 46.)

1. Do you believe in questionnaires?
2. If not for the questionnaire system, do you believe people would be aware that salt fish makes a person thirsty?
3. Do you believe that questionnaires can ask more questions than a wise man can answer?
4. What do you think of the Sphinx?
5. Arrange in the order of historical significance (a) filling out a questionnaire; (b) apprehension of Kenneth Ormiston on charge of conspiracy; (c) tennis rating of Count von Salm; (d) literary tastes of Prince Carol of Rumania.
6. In answering a questionnaire do you consider it necessary to understand the questions?
7. In filling out a questionnaire on the Einstein theory do you use a fountain pen or borrow a pencil from the cook?
8. For the purpose of answering a questionnaire, would you rather be routed out of bed by telephone or by special delivery?
9. In filling out a questionnaire do you use your own stamps or do you go on record on crucial questions only when prepaid and self-addressed?
10. In filling out a questionnaire do your answers proceed from life-long convictions or from the Book of Knowledge?
11. Which ten questionnaires would you take with you to a desert island?
12. Are you in favor of transporting all questionnaires to a desert island without going there yourself?

Superfluity.

The Surplus problem is taking on world-wide dimensions. Great Britain has attacked the rubber surplus by limiting the production of rubber. Australia has attacked the wool surplus by limiting the production of wool. Brazil has tackled the coffee surplus by limiting the production of coffee. Egypt, reacting to the cotton surplus, has limited the cultivation of cotton during the next three years to one-third of the plantation area. But at Washington it is pleasant to note that such drastic measures are not making headway. Republican and Democratic Congressmen are firm in the conviction that as long as there are postoffice buildings and rivers and harbors it would be disastrous to go in for the economic heresy of limiting the growth of surpluses.

Foreign Notes.

In Rumania the question of who is to have charge of the country in case of the death of the present monarch has become acute. Queen Marie, Prince Carol, the wife of Prince Carol and Premier Averescu have all been mentioned. An enormous sensation was created by an American journalist who suggested that perhaps it would be a good idea to put the Rumanian people in charge of their country. He was immediately expelled.

In Italy a tax on bachelors has been decreed by Premier Mussolini, who has probably noticed too many black shirts with buttons missing.

In M. Poincaré's country the prodigal franc has been returning fast, but unfortunately the price of calf's meat has gone up proportionately.

In Nicaragua there are two Presidents, which constitutes a low record for the year.

In South America the Provinces of Tacna and Arica have upset an ancient scientific superstition by being in two countries at the same time.

In Great Britain, France and Italy they have been following up the news about our $355,000,000 surplus with extraordinary interest.

The Soviet Government in Russia has introduced compulsory military training for all young men. The New Republic, which has opposed this institution in America and in Western Europe, wishes to record its opposition to the procedure in Russia as well—The New Republic.

When The New Republic has gone on record with respect to Asia, Africa and Australia the issue will have been disposed of.

THE CASE OF HENRY [illegible]

History Quoted to Show Delay by [illegible] Clement VII in Annulment Case.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

THE TIMES, in referring to an address by Mgr. John L. Belford at a gathering of the Knights of Columbus, stated: "Mgr. Belford spoke of instances in which the Catholic Church had been 'unbending' regarding a true marriage tie." THE TIMES article quotes Mgr. Belford as saying, "We know what it cost the Church to annul Henry VIII."

If Mgr. Belford will turn to historical writers he will discover to what extent the Roman Catholic Church was "unbending" and why it was that the then Pope, Clement VII, refused to annul the marriage of Henry VIII with Catharine of Aragon. The petition to the Pope was made in 1527, and the Pope did not decide to refuse annulment until 1534.

I will quote from Green's "Short History of the English People" as to the political and military situation at that time: "The Pope was now at the Emperor's mercy." I also quote from "A Political and Social History of Modern Europe," written by Carlton J. H. Hayes, Associate Professor of History in Columbia University and who is a member of the Roman Catholic faith. On page 79, Vol. 1, it is stated: "Two years of warfare had left Charles V master of the Hapsburg family unquestionable masters of Italy." On Page 182, Vol. 1, it is stated: "Worse still, the Emperor Charles V, the nephew of Queen Catharine, would not [illegible] up cudgels in his aunt's behalf and threatened Clement with dire penalties if he nullified the marriage. The Pope complained truthfully that he was between the anvil and the hammer. There was little for him to do except to temporize and to put off decision as long as possible."

From the above the conclusion seems inevitable that it was not a case of the Pope being "unbending," but rather that the Pope was bending to the fullest extent in the face of the "dire penalties" with which he was threatened by Charles V.

STATE DEBT REPUDIATION.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

A recent article in favor of foreign investments contained the following paragraph:

"London's experience in the century before the war with foreign government municipal loans was that practically all countries met their obligations. The American States and a few of the Southern States were about the only exceptions."

Happily, default has not spread to the Old World, but it is still more [illegible] that, beyond Russia, there have been imitators in either hemisphere of some of our own Southern States." These, in number, still owe the outside world $77,620,000 of repudiated bonds. Mississippi and Florida repudiated part of their debtedness in 1842 and 1845, respectively. [illegible] manoeuvre in 1852 and 1878. Three of the repudiations, however, took place in the '70s after the reconstruction. Arkansas ended up with $7,800,000.

Few persons are aware that ample "scaling-down" or cancellations of obligations also occurred, apart from repudiations. More than $32,000,000 irrespective of millions of unpaid interest, thus disposed of in various "settlements," of which amount no less $25,200,000 canceled by four of the Southern [illegible] still in default, Alabama, Louisiana, [illegible] and South Carolina. Out of a total debtedness of $126,800,000 these four [illegible] scaled down 38 per cent., repudiated 38 per cent. and paid the balance, 24 per cent. These statistics are taken from a memorandum issued last year by the Treasury Department.

IS OR ARE TWO-THIRDS?

To the Editor of The New York Times:

In connection with THE TIMES editorial of Dec. 2, concerning the grammatical propriety of "There is (or are) two-thirds," &c., it is interesting to note the mathematical implications involved. From the viewpoint of pure mathematics "two-thirds" is a complete entity in itself, a bonafide individual member of the number system, and we may therefore correctly use "There is two-thirds," &c.

On the other hand, if we centre our attention on "thirds," i. e., emphasize the plurality of the concept by considering "two-thirds" as "two one-thirds," we would no more write "There is two-thirds" than we would write "There is two cents."

A SILENCE AND A LISTENING.

(For the Children of the Near East.)

How shall our laughter ring
Silvery around our heads while One of These,
Our other children of the whirlwind and [illegible]
Goes desolate still?
And how shall we ever know to walk
Into tomorrow and tomorrow and tomorrow
And greet full-eyed his face, frigid [illegible]
While darkness like a scarf is blown
Seven-fold across their faces?

And how shall we drink the wine and eat the bread
Of our rich plenitude
While One of These goes hungry at our gates?
A thousand Christs upon a thousand [illegible]
Will not avail to shield us from ourselves
If one go desolate.

Here in these thin accusing bodies [illegible] walks
The great procession of tomorrow. [illegible]
Dumbly and piteously the stifled centuries [illegible] fares forth.
How shall there be a wideness in the [illegible]
How wideness, in the West,
What heralded North or South
Shall have space large enough
To hide us from the hounds of our [illegible] bering
If One of These walk starved and [illegible]
In those far other lands
Near Sidon's slope,
In Caucasus or Syra's isle—
Far other lands their crying [illegible] near?

. . . . . .

Their voices are a silence and a [illegible]
A listening and a silence and a leaning [illegible] space. . . .
Now on the rhythms of these [illegible] couriers,
These countless marchers, invisible [illegible] waves,
Shall they not surely ride
Straight through the pathway of our [illegible] hearts
Home to their kingdom?

'ST. PAUL' RETAINED IN RAILROAD'S NAME

Bankers Dropping It Because of Bankruptcy Connotations in East Put It Back.

Insistence by commercial organizations of the City of St. Paul that the new name chosen for the St. Paul Railroad, the Chicago, Milwaukee & Pacific, left them without representation in the title, and without benefit from the road's million dollar advertising campaign, has resulted in the change of the name to the Chicago, Milwaukee, St. Paul & Pacific Railroad Company. Kuhn, Loeb & Co. and the National City Bank made this announcement yesterday adding that in the first instance "the word Pacific was included to indicate that the road was a transcontinental line."

"The word St. Paul," says the announcement, "was dropped in the interest of brevity and because the road is generally known throughout its territory as 'the Milwaukee.' However, various business associations have pointed out that there is a great sentimental attachment to the name 'St. Paul' throughout the Northwest, and have urged that the name of the city be not dropped from the name of the new company. The reorganization managers have been glad to defer to that sentiment and, therefore, at some convenient time before the new road takes possession of the property, the name will be changed to Chicago, Milwaukee, St. Paul & Pacific Railroad Company."

It was felt that to start the new company on its journey toward prosperity with the displeasure of a large volume of traffic would be giving it a heavy burden to carry. The bankers believe that eventually the unpleasant associations of financial failure which cling to the name St. Paul in the East will be forgotten, just as they have been in other instances where railroad companies have regained their credit standing.

WESTLAKE—At a stated meeting of the Board of Trustees of the Citizens Savings Bank held at the banking house, 56-58 Bowery, in the City of New York, on Dec. 9, 1926, the following minute was unanimously adopted and ordered to be recorded:

MINUTE.

The trustees of this bank have learned with deep regret of the death, on Nov. 10, 1926, of their associate, Frederick W. Westlake, and desire to enter upon the minutes of the board an expression of their appreciation of his sterling character and of the loss they have personally sustained.

Mr. Westlake was elected a member of the Board of Trustees on April 9, 1926, and, though young in service, he took a keen interest in the affairs of the bank, with an abiding sense of the obligations of a trustee.

By his personal modesty, his magnetic personality and unfailing courtesy, he endeared himself to all with whom he came in contact.

His was a character to remember with affection and to mourn with deepest sorrow. Death seized him in the midst of active interests and love of life, and the bank has lost a faithful trustee and the board a valued associate and friend.

The members of the board tender their sincere sympathy and condolences to his family and direct that a copy of this minute be sent to them, and that it be published in the daily papers.

FINANCIAL MARKETS

Return to Confused and Conflicting Movement of Stocks—Renewed Advance in Franc.

Perhaps the movements of outstanding interest in yesterday's markets were the increasing strength in bonds, whose average price passed even Thursday's figure, thereby further exceeding the highest wartime and postwar record, and the sharp upward reaction of the franc. The bond market clearly had its eye, first on the underlying money situation as indicated by last week's heavy oversubscription to the Treasury's 3¼ per cent. loan, second on the coming "January redistribution" of investment money. The franc, which closed more than ⅛ cent over Friday's lowest and nearly ¼ over Tuesday's, ended the week very near to the 4-cent price of Wednesday.

The week's experience seemed to indicate that the propelling force behind the franc was difficult to resist. An ordinary speculative market which, after prolonged and spectacular advance, is repeatedly attacked by speculators for the fall, with the result only of quick return to the high level, would be regarded with distrust. It would be said that it was being carried forward only by its own momentum, which was bound to be presently exhausted. This may conceivably be the outcome with the franc. But its market is at least peculiar in this respect, that last week's sellers were not investors realizing and that the really potent buyers, the remitters of capital home from foreign markets, were as near to the investment status as the foreign exchange market presents. It would seem, nevertheless, that the French Government and the bank must, for the sake of the French economic situation, find some way of arresting positively the violence of the rise.

The day's New York stock market hardly requires comment. It was mostly made up of profit-taking sales by last week's professional speculators for the rise. This process resulted in numerous declines in active shares, running from a fraction to 3 or 4 points. While this was going on, a smaller number of other stocks were bid up 3 to 4 points. There was no particular direction to the movement of the day, but it may on the whole be said to have ended the week in character.

Yesterday's cabled statement of Great Britain's November foreign trade probably ended the period in which the export trade was crippled, directly or indirectly, by the coal embargo. The month's exports were not the smallest of the strike period, but the November surplus of imports over exports was much the largest of the period, and in fact the greatest of any month but two in the past five years. To measure exactly what has happened as a result of a pig-headed British labor constituency and a leader who is now receiving personal ovations from the Third International at Moscow, the trade results between May 1 and the end of November are worth a separate reckoning. In those seven months, exports from Great Britain decreased £74,158,000 from the year before and imports increased £4,221,000, the surplus of imports thereby increasing £78,379,000 from the very large total which it reached last year.

This addition of $382,000,000 to an adverse merchandise balance that was already weighing heavily on England's international finance again rouses two inquiries, one retrospective and one prospective. The first inquiry is how, with such an accumulating burden of liabilities to be met abroad, it was possible that sterling exchange should have held all this season above last Autumn's rates, and that the Bank of England should have lost this Autumn $78,000,000 less gold on export than it lost in the Autumn of 1925. Probably gold shipments from Australia to New York in British account are partial explanation, but London's growing power to attract foreign capital under gold resumption explains more. The other query, what is to happen now to England's trade, is bound up with the problem, whether her manufacturers will have the vigor to recover promptly and decisively the foreign orders lost in the strike paralysis. It is hardly to be doubted that the effort to regain those markets will be actively pursued, even if with initial discouragement. As an economic test, the result will be of high interest.

FRANC NOW NEARER TO A STABLE PRICE

Government Is Expected to Hold Off Until Still Higher Level Is Reached.

REACTION IS DISCOUNTED

Authorities Differ on Danger of Rapid Appreciation in Currency Value.

When the French franc crossed the 4-cent level last week an important mile-post was passed in the march of France toward financial stabilization. The high point of the year, 4.00¾ cents, was reached on Wednesday, and though a slight reaction occurred later, this was considered the natural result of the almost uninterrupted advance in recent weeks. The franc was quoted at 3.96¼ cents at the close of the week.

In foreign exchange circles there is wide discussion of the probable stabilization point for the franc, but nothing concrete has been advanced as to what level will be chosen. The common impression here is that with general conditions still apparently forcing the franc up, the Government will hold off until a higher level has been reached and the franc has found its apparently true value under ordinary market influences. Continued decreases in French note circulation and other improvements in the financial situation contributed toward a further movement homeward of French capital, and of speculative buying of the franc in many parts of the world, as well as to covering by short sellers last week.

Look for Higher Level.

Traders pointed out that when the franc was hovering around 3 cents, there was talk of a 3½ cent franc, and that a 4-cent franc was discussed as a possibility when the rate was at 3.80. Now that the present level has been reached, speculation concerns itself with the idea of an appreciably higher level when stabilization is definitely undertaken. Whenever concrete action is attempted, it is regarded as assured that France will be in strong enough position to maintain the fixed price.

A modified attitude regarding the supposed dangers of a rapid appreciation in currency value has become apparent in recent weeks. A British view of this angle is contained in an article in The London Economist. Regarding the question of possible damage to French export trade, the article says that if France were to deflate today, the French exporter would at all events be able to find buyers in a world market which is fairly strong, and that it is probable that in the event of a cessation of so-called "valuta-dumping" of French goods, world market quotations would become firmer.

Cite Other Nations' Example.

It was pointed out, also, that in the cases of Austria, Germany and Poland stabilization was so effected that no immediate deflation occurred, yet later events proved that serious depression in those countries had only been postponed. The point also is made that while a rise in the franc would create a fall in prices and thus reduce profits, it would also lead to relatively low rates of interest, which would be very helpful in the management of the floating debt.

Some students of the French situation insist that recovery in the franc ought to be effected slowly if it is to be permanent. The Economist says, however, that there are reasons for believing such a view fundamentally wrong. In the event of an immediate and sudden improvement the significance of the monetary change would be brought home to the people at large and the necessary readjustments would be made without serious resistance, owing to the favorable psychological atmosphere. If, on the other hand, the recovery is too slow, a long-drawn-out fight between employers and employed is to be feared.

FRENCH PAPER ISSUES NOT BEING CONCEALED

Bank Declares Notes Issued to Buy Gold Are Included in Circulation Statement.

The unexpected reduction of the French bank's note circulation as shown in its report last week, bringing the outstanding paper currency nearly 4,000,000,000 francs below the high point of August, caused much discussion as to whether note issues by the bank to purchase gold were included in the statement. The bank has paid out to date, in purchase of gold and silver, upward of 1,500,000,000 francs of paper notes.

If these note issues were not included in the official statements of outstanding note circulation, then the actual decrease in the note issues would be smaller than the figures appear to indicate. The market's general impression had been that notes issued to purchase coin were not thus included. The Bank of France, however, in a special "communiqué," answered the question as follows:

"Certain persons persist in believing that the notes actually in circulation are the subject of accountancy; the one made public in the item 'Notes in Circulation' in the weekly statement, and the other concealed and dissimulated in the item 'Sundries' in the same statement.

"All of the notes in circulation, without exception, whether they have been issued in connection with commercial operations, against advances to the State or in payment for purchases of gold, silver and currency instruments authorized by the law of Aug. 7, 1926, figure without distinction under the item, 'Notes in Circulation.'

FOR STABLE CREDITS IN INSTALMENT SALES

Bankers, After Thorough Survey of 34 Industries, Would Make Methods More Uniform.

A plan to stabilize credit in automobile financing and other industries is to be projected, it was announced yesterday, as the result of a sweeping survey of credit conditions in thirty-four industries just concluded by the Advisory Committee on Finance and Industrial Credits, made up of representatives of Stock Exchange firms and banking houses and legally advised by Morgan J. O'Brien.

A summary of the survey points out that at the end of the World War manufacturers in virtually every field were faced with plant capacities vastly in excess of the normal consumption of their markets. The situation lent itself ideally to the theory of deferred payment or instalment purchasing. This theory has continued to be the answer to the manufacturers' problem during both the depression period of 1921 and the period of steadily increasing prosperity since 1922.

"At present the instalment sale of utilities" says the survey, "is a tremendous force in the economic life of the country. Like any huge force, it must be properly guided and controlled, if it is to create and not to destroy.

"As the terms of instalment selling range generally from six months to two or even three years, it has not been practical for our banks to finance this business. There have therefore grown up throughout the country organizations known as finance companies which discount the paper of the purchaser for the manufacturer or dealer, and which are at present the guiding factors in the instalment business. However, only a meagre handful of these companies is national in scope and importance—not more than a dozen out of 1,500. Competition among the others has grown so keen that they are no longer real guiding powers, and are in danger of becoming blind and undirected forces."

WHERE BRITISH TRADE HAS BEEN HARDEST HIT

Year's Loss Heaviest in Exports to European Continent—Germany Gained Most Largely.

The report of the British Board of Trade on the distribution by countries of England's exports and imports during the first nine months of 1926 attracted particular interest as reflecting the effects of the British coal strike. As a consequence of that strike, and consequent decrease of production in other industries, total British imports during the nine months had decreased £80,000,000 from the year preceding and British exports had decreased £83,000,000.

The greater part of the loss in exports is now shown to have occurred in shipments to the European continent, which decreased £54,114,000 from 1925. Of that decrease £9,115,000 occurred in exports to France, £15,062,000 in trade with Germany, £5,369,000 in trade with Italy and £6,676,000 in trade with the Netherlands. England's imports from France decreased £5,982,000, from Italy £3,256,000, from Switzerland £3,743,000 and from Spain £1,886,000. But imports from Germany increased £15,372,000 during the period and from the Netherlands £4,262,000, both probably representing importations of coal.

Exports to foreign countries, outside of Continental Europe and the British Empire, decreased £15,947,000, of which decrease £,772,000 occurred in trade with the United States, £3,410,000 in trade with Argentina, £2,355,000 in trade with Brazil and £2,954,000 in trade with Egypt. Somewhat strikingly, however, British exports to China increased £2,547,000. Importations by England from the United States decreased £18,564,000 during the nine months, from Chile £2,582,000, from Egypt £3,995,000 and from China £1,586,000.

TRADE CONDITIONS IN THE NORTHWEST MIXED

Some Commercial Indications Show Greater Activity, Others Reflect Slackening.

Reviewing in its current monthly bulletin the Autumn trade developments in the Northwest, the Reserve Bank of Minneapolis states that "in the largest cities and most of the Spring wheat belt business was not as active as a year ago. However, there were important sections where business was good. Check payments through banks in the smaller cities in the southern part of this district, where live stock and dairying are the important industries, were larger than a year ago. The iron ore movement was the largest for October since 1918.

"Fall buying in all reported lines is smaller than a year ago. Retail trade at representative department stores and shipments of flour and linseed products were nearly one-fifth smaller than in 1925.

"The movement of live stock to market was larger than last year, except for hogs. Receipts of sheep at South St. Paul were the largest in any month since 1911. The demand for stocker and feeder animals by corn belt live stock growers was very heavy. Five times as many hogs were shipped from South St. Paul to country points in October this year as a year ago, and the outward movement of sheep was nearly three times as large as a year ago.

"Prospective business activity based upon building operations, as reflected in the total valuation of building permits granted at eighteen cities in this district, was 19 per cent. smaller in October than a year ago."

Nassau National Bank Expansion.

Stockholders of the Nassau National Bank of Brooklyn will be asked at the annual meeting on Jan. 11 to authorize an increase in the capital stock to $1,500,000. Five thousand shares of new stock would be offered to shareholders at $200 a share and the $1,000,000 proceeds would be used to increase capital from $1,000,000 to $1,500,000 and surplus from $1,000,000 to $1,500,000.

TOPICS IN WALL STREET.

News, Comment and Incident, On the Stock Exchange and In the Financial Markets.

Some of the stocks which have been most active recently wavered under profit-taking on yesterday's market, but the general tone was firm. Shares of companies that will profit by heavy Christmas buying were under accumulation during the two-hour trading period, and showed substantial gains at the close. These included Montgomery Ward, Radio Corporation, National Department Stores, Sears, Roebuck and a few others.

"Christmas Markets."

The sudden strength on the Stock Exchange last week was commonly described by Wall Street as a "Christmas market." Rising prices in the two or three weeks before Christmas Day are a very old Wall Street tradition. A search of the record of more recent years showed that the Christmas market has usually put in an appearance but not always. Last year the rise was slight, notwithstanding much favorable news. In 1924 the real investment movement which followed the Coolidge victory culminated in Christmas week, the year's highest prices being reached on December 26. There was only a meager Christmas market in 1923, yet stocks advanced. In 1922 the Christmas season brought prices to the high point of the year along with recovery of trade and sudden resumption of purchases by consumers. The Christmas market was altogether lacking in 1921, however, and in 1920, when the critical state of industry was becoming unmistakable in December and when even commercial paper loaned at 8 per cent., stocks fell 14 points in the three weeks before Christmas.

Why the Railroad Shares Advanced.

The rather unusual vitality of the railroad stocks last week, which enabled them to establish many new high records for the year in the face of a wage increase which it is variously estimated will add from $60,000,000 to $100,000,000 to their payroll, surprised many well-informed railroad men. The reason appeared to Wall Street to rest primarily in the weakened attraction of the industrials from both an investment and speculative standpoint. The railroad shares, it was argued at the week-end, have been attractive all along, but the industrials have been more so, and have thus received most of the speculative market's attention. There was certainly some feeling, at the week-end, that the industrial group had "discounted" favorable possibilities in a far greater degree than the railways.

Bond Prices, Now and Since 1913.

Much interest was created in Wall Street on Thursday when the average price of representative bonds, which, until then, had ranged below the early day since April, 1913. The movement caused reminiscence of the remarkable fluctuation of bond prices since 1913. Between the beginning of 1914 and the outbreak of the war THE TIMES's "bond average" fell from 89% to 82%. After the Stock Exchange had reopened, following four months' suspension of business, the average rose from 81½ at the beginning of 1915 to nearly 88½ in January, 1917, when we broke with Germany. During our own participation in the war it declined from 86¾ in April, 1917, to 74½ in December of the same year, rose in 1918 to 82¾, reached on the day after the armistice, but thereafter fell to 71¾ in December, 1918, and to 65½ in May of 1920, the month of the 7 per cent. Reserve Bank rate. That was low record. Following an irregular movement in 1921, steady recovery ensued, interrupted only by partial reaction late in 1923, until the high point of 89¾ was reached last week.

Light on the South's Position.

The opening of the first two "Winter offices" in Florida by New York Stock Exchange houses brought to light last week the fact that members of the Stock Exchange who maintain brokerage offices in Florida during the Winter months do not anticipate any slackening of the normal and usual volume of business that they get at the resorts each year. The elaborate offices which have been maintained in recent years in Palm Beach and nearby cities will again be maintained this year.

Another Feud Breaks Out.

Although they do business with each other daily, it is not of record that the dealers in bonds have any particular love for the officers of banking houses of issue, with whom they are obliged to do business. There is generally a feud on between them over the size of allotments. When a bond issue goes extremely well, the dealers claim they get only a small allotment; they are also apt to point out that they are sure to get a large allotment when a particular issue does not go so well. The current feud is between the dealers and one of the banks which cut down its allotments to dealers this week, on a particularly successful issue, to a bare 2 per cent. The groans and wails set up by the dealers, many of whom had taken "firm orders" from their customers, could be heard from the Battery to the BRONX.

Phases of the "Holiday Trade."

Preparations for the Christmas holiday trade have had their usual effect on the currency situation at this time of the year. While the highest point of the retail buying will not arrive for a week or ten days, the banks customarily make their arrangements considerably in advance. Many Christmas Clubs make their savings distributions around the 1st of December and accumulate funds in advance of that date. Gold coins also are accumulated, for the demand for these on the banks nearly always exceeds the supply. These factors were considered responsible for the increase of $16,080,204 in circulating money in the United States on Dec. 1, as compared with Nov. 1. The Federal Reserve notes also reached the year's high point last week; they have in fact reached such a maximum in Christmas week every year but three since the Reserve system was founded.

Tax Cut vs. Debt Reduction.

The question, What use will be made of the Treasury surplus? was the subject of lively discussion in Wall Street last week. With a straight tax reduction law apparently out of the question, the choice was assumed to lie between a refund, as suggested by President Coolidge and mentioned in Secretary Mellon's report, and application of still more money to reduction of the public debt. While both plans were admitted to have their advocates, the tax refund seemed to command more favor. The stimulus to business which would follow a lessening of the tax burden was the chief argument put forward. Rapid diminishment of the outstanding supply of Government securities is not altogether welcomed in Wall Street, on the ground that it is steadily closing up an avenue for the placing of short-term funds by corporations and financial institutions. It was pointed out also last week that it will take many years for the debt reduction to effect real savings to the taxpayer, since the money saved is turned into the sinking fund and no change is made in the proportion of public revenues devoted to caring for the national debt.

Last Week's Movements of Gold.

Imports of gold last week, as reported by the Federal Reserve Bank of New York, were $433,000, received chiefly from England and Ecuador. Exports of gold were $1,219,000, the bulk of which went to Java and Mexico.

You can possess the things that make life pleasant and joyous only if your income has kept pace with the rising cost of living

Thousands of people have discovered that in order to offset higher living costs it is necessary to obtain a liberal income from their investments. They must have a share in the profits of business, not merely a fixed bond interest, whose purchasing power has declined one-third.

And yet these people rightly demand the safety which can be had only in good bonds!

Profit Sharing Bonds may be reserved Now for January delivery. Purchasers will participate in forthcoming Profit Sharing Distribution.

PROFIT SHARING BONDS

Solve the problem. In addition to better-than-average interest, paid four times a year, their owners receive, once a year, a share of the profits of a Hodson Enterprise, backed by the 33 year Hodson record of successful investment and banking service.

Since 1893 Clarence Hodson and Associates have underwritten or been associated in selling securities of over 60 National Banks, State Banks, Trust Companies and Industrial Loan Companies.

Hodson-Financed Banking Institutions have earned 15%, some 20%, some 30% and in one case the net earnings were 82% for a single year—

..... and no Hodson Investment has ever defaulted.

This is a record seldom equalled in the entire history of American finance.

[One of our Profit Sharing Bond Issues has paid a total of 124% in 13 years. Original purchasers of these bonds will continue to receive liberal income and will get their principal back at maturity.]

Are you tired of saying "I Can't Afford It" when you see something you want or need? Would you like to increase your income by participating in profits, just as able, shrewd big-business men do? "The Laundry Industry"

A comparatively new industry to the world of finance, but long established and with a venerable record and history in the industrial world.

The laundry industry has shown a phenomenal growth in the last decade, until now it is reputed to rank twelfth in volume of income among the industries of the nation.

Outstanding factors contribute to the belief that this industry is now on the verge of even larger expansion. A number of these reasons may be summed up as follows:

1. Increasing congestion in living conditions which has rendered washing and drying at home almost a physical impossibility.
2. Refusal of the present generation of housewives to launder at home.
3. Inability to obtain domestic help.
4. Evolution from what ten years ago was almost entirely a "collar and shirt" business to include today the entire family wash.
5. Higher standards of living and dress.
6. Public appreciation of the general development and greatly increased efficiency throughout the entire industry.
7. Reduction of cost, resulting from improved methods and increasing volume of business, which has rendered the service universally available.

We have prepared a 16-page book giving the history and some vital statistics of the laundry industry which we shall furnish upon request.

CROP ABANDONMENT IN COTTON IS LIKELY

Million Bales Is Estimate by Some Traders of Amount to Be Left in Fields.

NEW PICKING IS WASTEFUL

But Practices That Seem Economic Waste Find Defenders—Old Farm Customs Cited.

All indications point to abandonment of grown cotton in the fields on a record scale this year, according to opinion expressed in well-informed trading circles last week. While the actual extent of this abandonment cannot be estimated exactly, it was predicted by competent observers that next year would see a repetition of scenes noted in the Spring of 1918, when Southern farmers in some cases plowed for the next crop through fields white with cotton grown the preceding year.

Traders, asked to estimate the probable amount of cotton that will be abandoned in the fields this year, pointed out that there is no way of making such an estimate with accuracy. They said this very uncertainty offered a certain basis for explaining any excess of the Government's estimate of total crop production for the year over the amount of the cotton actually ginned. A discrepancy between these two figures may always be explained by saying that the crop estimate was right but that a percentage was left in the field.

May Leave Million Bales.

Despite this situation, one authority last week hazarded the estimate that the amount of cotton to be left in the fields this year may total 1,000,000 bales. He based this estimate largely on the figure showing the amount of the 1926 cotton crop ginned to date, compared with the estimated total for the crop. From these figures he deduced that there was too great an amount of cotton to be ginned before the end of the year to put all the indicated crop into bales. While the gins would be equal to the undertaking, the cotton would not be picked at such a rate, he said.

Another authority said that if cotton destroyed through wasteful harvesting were taken into account the amount of unharvested cotton this year would exceed 1,000,000 bales. He said that in Northwest Texas and Western Oklahoma "stripping" and "sledding" had been substituted for the usual methods of picking. Ordinarily cotton is picked boll by boll. "Stripping," on the other hand, consists in grasping the plant by the stalk with the gloved hand and removing bolls, leaves and stalks in one movement.

"Sledding," which is even more wasteful, consists in pushing a box with a wedge-shaped opening that catches the stems of the plants along the furrows where they are planted. This method not only damages the bolls and mixes them with the leaves, but also leaves the bolls on the lower side of the plants unharvested.

The quality of the cotton in the fields is another important factor pointing toward record abandonment, it was said. Cotton now in the fields is said to be of such poor grade that after picking and ginning expenses there would be no profit in harvesting it. Even when the cheaper methods of stripping or sledding are used to harvest the crop, there is a 25 per cent. wastage. Owing to the percentage of waste matter mixed with the bolls when stripping is employed it takes from 1,500 to 1,600 pounds of harvested cotton to make a 500-pound bale. The amount required if sledding is used varies from 2,500 to 3,000 pounds.

Abandonment Defended.

A policy of abandonment in the cotton crop situation was not without defenders in trading circles. While abandonment appears on the face of things to be an economic waste, these commentators held that bumper crops were to be classified as accidents of nature for which the producer should not be penalized. One seasoned observer of trends in cotton who saw no economic ill in abandonment compared conditions in the belt to those existing in agriculture at all times.

"In planting his Vermont farm my grandfather always followed the practice of 'planting enough for a poor year and too much for a good year,'" said this authority. "Then, if there were a short crop, he could profitably harvest all the apples, potatoes, turnips or other crops he had sown. If, on the other hand, there was a bumper crop, he harvested only what he could profitably market. His methods were sometimes criticized, but he could say he sent his sons to college on the proceeds of a Vermont farm."

As final argument in favor of the likelihood of record crop abandonment this year the experience of previous bumper cotton crop years is cited. Abandonment of crop on a large scale was first noted in the record crop years of 1914 and 1920. This year, with a record crop of 18,618,000 bales estimated, conditions are even more conducive to abandonment.

Royal Bank to Increase Capital.

MONTREAL, Dec. 11 (AP).—The Royal Bank of Canada today announced an increase of $5,600,000 in its capital stock. The new shares will be allotted at $200 each to shareholders of record of Dec. 11 in the proportion of one new share for every five shares now held. The present price of shares is $280. The change will increase the bank's capital to $30,000,000 and its reserve to an equal amount.

ENJOINS SEIBERLING IN GOODYEAR CASE

Federal Court in Toledo Sets Dec. 20 for Hearing on Extension of Order.

MRS. BENEDICT'S PETITION

Decision on Injunction Regarded as Important to Future of Rubber Company.

TOLEDO, Ohio, Dec. 11 (AP).—Hearing on a temporary restraining order obtained today by Mrs. Kathrine G. Benedict of New York, a stockholder in the Goodyear Tire and Rubber Company, against F. A. Seiberling, once Goodyear's President, and his associates, has been set for Dec. 20 in Federal Court here. The suit, understood to be backed by important interests in the company, is to prevent Mr. Seiberling and two associates from exercising any duties as voting trustees of common stock.

Three suits filed previously in State courts by the Seiberling interests and the County Prosecutor at Akron seek to reopen the refinancing settlement of 1923 and to oust the present Board of Directors. If today's injunction is made permanent, Mr. Seiberling will be relieved of the voting power invested in him by holders of a large block of common stock and the way will have been opened for a recapitalization of the company. However, if the injunction is dissolved, Mr. Seiberling and his associates, it is believed, will be in a stronger position than ever to push their suits against the present management and the bankers' committee headed by Clarence Dillon of Dillion, Read & Co. of New York and John Sherwin of Cleveland. This committee was named after Mr. Seiberling had retired as President in 1921.

The effect of a permanent restraining order would be to return the voting power to the real holders of the common stock and to submit directly to them a recapitalization plan, it is charged, the Seiberling group is attempting to block.

Bank Built From Bankruptcy Pays Dividend After 12 Years

The Mutual Bank of Roseville, a section of Newark, announced yesterday the declaration of a 25 per cent. dividend.

This is the first dividend declared by the bank, which was organized in 1914 after the failure of the old Roseville Trust Company. Depositors in the old bank were allowed credit in the new bank for 40 per cent. of the deposits which they had in the Roseville Trust Company when it failed. For the remaining 60 per cent. of their deposits they received capital stock in the Mutual Bank. The declaration of the dividend, the announcement says, marks the final accounting and full payment to the depositors in the old bank.

Buy Guaranteed Safety

90% of All Estates of $5,000 and Over Vanish In 7 Years

It is also said that 32% of all widows in the country are compelled to earn their own living. The above figures are quoted from a prominent business publication.

In many cases estates are dissipated and widows left destitute because of poor investments. Money is left to men and women who have little or no investment experience. These become prey for the financial crook as well as for the broker with honest intentions who sells highly speculative securities to earn large commissions. Even experienced investors are often tempted to seek an income which a safe investment cannot possibly pay.

The Solution of The Problem

If you are, or expect to be the beneficiary of an estate or a legacy—decide now on this course:

Buy investments Guaranteed by the Lawyers Mortgage Company—one of the oldest, strongest and most cautious mortgage guarantee institutions. These Guaranteed First Mortgages and Guaranteed First Mortgage Certificates are legal investment for trust funds in this State.

Banks, charitable institutions and executors of estates have purchased them for years. The Guaranteed yield is 5% and 5½%. This is the highest return that goes with absolute safety. We Guarantee payment of both principal and interest and carefully watch each property. Thus the holder is relieved of all care of the investment. Interest checks are mailed promptly on the day due. No coupons to cash.

These and other features of Safety and Convenience combine in making this investment ideal for those who should not take chances and who do not want to be bothered or worried.

Issued in any amount from $100 to $100,000 and more, with our unqualified guarantee. Send the coupon for descriptive illustrated booklet. Ask also for LIMITING CAPITAL EXPORT.

New French Provision to Restrict Purchase of Foreign Currencies.

As stated in the Paris newspapers, French Chambers of Commerce have been entrusted with the duty of attaching their visa to applications for the purchase of foreign currency made by importers. The applications must subsequently be produced at the banks, which keep a register of exchange transactions, in support of orders for purchases of currency made to pay abroad for goods already imported or to be imported within a maximum period of six months into France, French colonies or protectorates.

Although provisional permits exempts importers from the formality of applying to their Chamber in regard to each particular transaction, these permits only allow them to procure foreign currency as and when it is required by them. Moreover, the renewal of provisional permits is subject to the condition that the importer submits to the Chamber the necessary proof that they have really been used for the settlement abroad of transactions relating to the importation of goods.

COPPER PRODUCTION SHOWS AN INCREASE

New Cornelia Sets a New Record for November Output.

Special to The New York Times.

BOSTON, Mass., Dec. 11.—Dome Mines production in November was valued at $321,308, against $324,639 in October, $324,774 in September and $379,980 in November, 1925.

The New Cornelia Company, 70 per cent. of whose 1,880,000 shares are owned by the Calumet & Arizona Mining Company, produced more copper in November than in any other month in its history, almost 8,500,000 pounds. This brings the output for the eleven months of 1926 up to 77,856,000 pounds, indicating at least 85,000,000 pounds for the full year, compared with 71,732,000 pounds in 1925, and an annual output of only 30,060,000 pounds three years ago. This November output shows New Cornelia's reduction works now have capacity for well over 100,000,000 pounds of copper annually. When the new 5,000-ton flotation plant was conceived, a capacity of 90,000,000 pounds for the whole property was estimated.

It is estimated that the mines of the Michigan copper district produced 14,800,000 pounds of refined copper in November. Of this total Calumet & Hecla Consolidated is credited with 8,800,000 pounds, Mohawk 1,450,000, Copper Range 1,860,000, Quincy 1,100,000, Seneca 700,000 and Isle Royale 800,000. Metal business continues good at the smelters.

Seneca is opening good ground north of both Nos. 2 and 3 shafts and more attention will be paid to this part of the property the coming year. The second level north from No. 1 shaft will be extended north of No. 3 in Gratiot territory. This will be the second opening in this particular area. The twelfth level north, continues to open good values and stoping is under way. Satisfactory vein rock is being opened in the seventeenth and eighteenth levels of No. 2, both north and south.

The United States Mine of the United States Smelting Company has completed its new shaft to the 1,000-foot level and drifting has begun.

Shipments of ore to the smelters from the mining districts of Utah for the week ending Dec. 4 follows: Bingham, United States Mine of the United States Smelting Company, 61 carloads; Utah Apex 14, Bingham Mines, 12; Park Bingham, 6; Ohio Copper, 3 carloads of copper precipitates. The Utah Delaware and the Utah Copper Company's production continued unchanged. Park City, Park Utah Consolidated, shipped 7,961 tons; Silver King coalition, 1,437 tons; Ontario Silver, 489 tons; Eureka, the American Smelting and Refining Company, shipped 31 carloads of dump ore, and Bingham Mines 18 carloads of concentrates; Colorado, 1.

The Mountain View Mine of the Anaconda Copper Company has been reopened after being closed for several months. The Mountain Consolidated Mine has been closed for general repairs. This change will not result in any decrease in production.

SEWARD BANK IS APPROVED.

To Serve Business Area Around Park Av. and 33d St.

Announcement was made yesterday of the approval by the Controller of the Currency at Washington of the organization of the Seward National Bank of New York, being formed to meet the banking needs of the new business and financial district of midtown New York, centring around Park Avenue and Thirty-third Street. The location of the new bank, in which many leading business men of the section are interested, will be announced later.

The organization committee is composed of Howard E. Atterbury, President of Atterbury Brothers; Lionel Straus, President of F. A. Straus & Co., Inc.; Charles C. Davis, Vice President of Eaton, Crane, Pike & Co.; Henry W. Nickols, Vice President of Valvoline Oil Company, and Arien G. Swiger of the law firm of Willcox, Hunt & Swiger, of which William R. Willcox is the head. An announcement yesterday said:

"The new bank will open at the earliest possible date with a capital of $2,000,000 and a surplus of $1,000,000. The organization committee has been working for many months and has associated with it a number of business men prominent in the textile, paper, furniture and manufacturing industries, and others which centre around the proposed location of the bank."

WOULD SELL POWER LINES.

Adirondack Company Asks Permit for Deal With Utica Concern.

A petition filed with the Public Service Commission in Albany by the Adirondack Power and Light Corporation asks for authority to sell to the Utica Gas and Electric Company the Adirondack's distributing system in the village of Oriskany, Oneida County, a transmission line from the Oriskany substation of the New York State Railways to Oriskany; its distributing system in the town and village of Frankfort and that part of its Utica-Clark Mills transmission line from Whitestone to the Clark Mills substation in the towns of Whitestone, New Hartford and Kirkland, all in Oneida County.

The petition says the service rendered by the petitioner at the places named is in the territory served by the Utica company and that the petitioner believes the public interest will be best served by the latter company. The commission will have a public hearing on the petition.

FOREIGN EXCHANGE

Lire Soars to Highest in Two Years on Sudden Movement Against "Shorts."

A violent upturn in the Italian lire, which was carried to 4.55¼ cents, highest in more than two years, featured the foreign exchanges yesterday. It was a coup against the "shorts" engineered by agencies representing the Government. The spurt which the bill staged here late on Friday was carried to London and caused a flurry among Continental speculators in Amsterdam, Berlin, London and Switzerland, who had been heavy sellers over the last three weeks.

Dealers conversant with the movement of the lire said that between thirty-five and forty million lire must have changed hands on the transaction—here and in London—the supply coming chiefly from previous long liquidating for profit. The recent favorable statement of Italian finances by Count Volpi and the successful subscription to the littorio loan, in which Italians in this country participated heavily, helped in the rout of the "shorts".

There was also a fresh turn in the franc after Friday's irregularity, Paris checks moving up 7¼ points to 3.98¼ cents. Trading in sterling, the Scandinavians, Holland and other descriptions was small and changes unimportant. This was likewise the status of the business in South Americans and Easterns.

OIL'S FUTURE BRIGHT TO HIM

Mason Day Optimistic Regarding the Industry in 1927.

An exceedingly bright outlook rules for 1927 in the oil industry, said Mason Day, Vice President of the Sinclair Exploration Company, who sailed yesterday on the Majestic, with other Sinclair officials, to inspect oil properties in Russia and Africa.

"Officials of the Sinclair company and other oil men I have consulted expected 1927 to be a very profitable year for the industry," Mr. Day said. "I look for record oil consumption. Sinclair's operations in Angola are progressing satisfactorily."

FEWER BUILDING CONTRACTS

Total Value East of Rockies in November Declines 6%.

A decline of 6 per cent. from October was noted in the total construction contracts awarded during November in thirty-seven States east of the Rocky Mountains, comprising 91 per cent. of the total construction of the country, the F. W. Dodge Corporation reports. Contracts in November amounted to $487,012,500, which is an increase, however, in comparison with the amount in November, 1925.

Important items in November's total were $229,820,900 for residential buildings, $64,781,100 for industrial buildings, $59,657,100 for commercial buildings, $50,128,400 for public works and utilities, $34,571,800 for educational buildings, $24,691,100 for social and recreational projects, $9,603,900 for hospitals and institutions and $9,329,800 for religious and memorial buildings.

During the first eleven months of 1926 there was $5,812,518,900 of construction started in the thirty-seven States, which was 6 per cent. more than the $5,477,581,100 started in the like period of last year.

BRITISH EXPORTS CUT HEAVILY IN NOVEMBER

Surplus of Imports £9,053,000 Greater Than in 1923—Imports Below Last Year.

LONDON, Dec. 11.—Following are the Board of Trade's figures of Great Britain's foreign commerce for November: Total imports, £113,290,000; exports of British products, £53,060,000; re-exports, foreign goods, £11,000,000; total exports, £64,060,000; excess of imports, £49,230,000.

The statement shows the following changes from the figures for October:

Exports, British products	dec.	£116,000
Re-exports, for. goods	inc.	639,000
Total exports	inc.	523,000
Imports	inc.	2,287,000
Excess of imports	inc.	1,755,000

Compared with November, 1925, the statement shows the following changes:

Exports, British products	dec.	£7,917,000
Re-exports, for. goods	dec.	2,538,000
Total exports	dec.	10,455,000
Imports	dec.	1,402,000
Excess of imports	inc.	9,053,000

Trade for November, 1926, compares as follows with October, 1926, and November, 1925:

	Nov., 1926.	Oct., 1926.	Nov., 1925.
Expts., British goods	£53,060,000	£53,176,663	£60,977,257
Re-expts, for. goods	11,000,000	10,361,102	13,538,265
Total expts.	£64,060,000	£63,337,763	£74,515,622

Excess of impts	£49,230,000	£47,475,938	£40,177,262

In November, 1913, total British exports were £52,756,807; imports were £68,467,075; excess of imports, £15,710,268.

Trade for the eleven completed months of 1926 compares as follows with the same period one and two years ago:

	1926.	1925.	1924.
Exports, Brit. goods	£602,181,000	£707,317,749	£726,056,715
Re-exports, foreign goods	114,063,000	139,766,500	128,096,798
Total exports	£716,244,000	£847,084,249	£854,153,513
Imports	1,129,640,000	1,188,682,445	1,148,244,130
Excess of imports	£413,396,000	£341,598,196	£294,090,617

Exports of British products during recent months make the following comparison:

	1926.	1925.	1924.
Nov.	£53,060,000	£60,977,257	£68,150,816
Oct.	53,176,663	67,061,966	68,346,838
Sept.	50,680,003	60,734,868	63,282,876
Aug.	49,780,744	61,037,290	66,288,294

The largest monthly export since the war was £137,451,904, in July, 1920; the smallest, £23,152,228, in June, 1922.

Imports during November make the following comparison with other months:

	1926.	1925.	1924.
Nov.	£113,290,000	£114,692,884	£118,740,228
Oct.	111,013,703	108,838,924	120,472,658
Sept.	101,724,341	97,934,748	100,854,706
Aug.	101,137,290	91,737,921	102,167,932

Largest monthly imports since the war were £183,098,388, in July, 1920; smallest, £69,384,957, in February, 1922.

For the same period the monthly excess of imports, after allowing for imported merchandise re-exported, compares as follows:

	1926.	1925.	1924.
Nov.	£49,230,000	£40,177,262	£38,262,427
Oct.	47,475,938	28,376,218	28,006,290
Sept.	42,961,677	28,074,050	28,005,295
Aug.	42,780,029	17,200,254	26,909,600

The largest surplus of imports since the war was £82,543,136, in January, 1919; the smallest, £865,512, in February, 1922.

SAYS SUGAR PRICES REST WITH EUROPE

Review Declares Demand Will Be Greatest Factor in Rise Next Season.

FOREIGN CROPS SHORT

Cuba to Export 278,000 Tons, Leaving Only 55,000 Tons on the Island.

European demand will prove the greatest factor toward raising prices of sugar in the coming season, according to a review by the Czarnikow-Rionda Company. It further says that shipments from Cuba this month will probably total 225,000 tons to the United States and 50,000 tons to Europe, Canada and the Far East, leaving only 55,000 tons on the island. If shipments from Cuba exceed these estimates, there will be practically no sugar stocks left on the island by Jan. 1, according to the review. The review says in part:

"The outlook in 1927 is dependent on many complex market factors. Production of domestic beet sugar and of cane sugar in Louisiana and insular possessions may be 100,000 tons in excess of the past year. Stocks on Dec. 31, 1927, will probably not be as large as on the same date this year by 150,000 tons. Imports from Cuba to the United States this year having been 3,750,000 tons, it is therefore possible that shipments from Cuba to this country in 1927 will be 3,500,000 tons minimum, provided exports of refined and consumption are the same. Total supplies in Cuba next year, with the crop limited to 4,500,000 tons, will be 4,400,000 tons, figuring in local consumption and a carryover into 1927 of 50,000 tons. A further assumption is that the 1927-28 crop in Cuba will again not commence before Jan. 1, 1928. Under these conditions there will be available for export from Cuba to destination other than the United States a maximum of 900,000 tons.

"European crops are short 500,000 tons. Stocks at the beginning of the new year will not be anything like what they were early this year, because imports from Cuba have not been near as large, and Australians, Mauritius, &c., are not available in the same volume. Therefore the strong point in the situation is the demand from Europe for Cubas next year. If the Far East should purchase even only 150,000 tons and Canada takes 100,000 tons, then only 650,000 tons would be left for Europe, which is little more than this year. In 1925 Europe received 1,145,064 tons of Cubas, when beet production was 180,000 tons larger than the present estimate of 6,953,000 tons for 1926-27. It is quite evident that European cane requirements will have to be partly replenished from other sources than Cuba.

"Whether Javas of the next crop will again sell to Europe either out of the balance of the present crop or out of next year's crop after May, 1927, and in what quantity, is a question that can only be answered in the future, but new crop Javas can hardly arrive in Europe much before August or September. There is, for that reason, little doubt that the European demand for Cubas early in 1927 will constitute a strong market factor."

Supplies and exports of Cuban sugar as compiled and estimated by the Czarnikow-Rionda Company compare as follows:

	1927.	1926.
Total supplies	4,400,000	4,750,055
Exports:
United States	3,500,000	3,731,645
Foreign	900,000	962,771
Total	4,400,000	4,694,416
Carryover	......	55,639
Re-exports of refined from United States	100,000	90,000

RAIL EQUIPMENT ORDERED.

Japanese Systems Adopt American Electric Switching Devices.

Equipment orders reported last week by Railway Age included one Prairie type locomotive for the St. Louis and O'Fallon, placed with the Baldwin Locomotive Works, and twenty automatic dump cars for the New York Central, placed with the Clark Car Company.

The General Railway Signal Company has booked an order for an electric interlocking machine with twenty-seven working levers for the Cleveland, Cincinnati, Chicago & St. Louis. The Union Switch & Signal Company has received orders for similar devices from the Tokio Underground Railway and the Imperial Government Railways of Japan.

New inquiries include seventy tank cars for the Skelly Oil Company, and twenty-five ballast cars for the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western. The Chicago & Eastern Illinois will rebuild 200 freight cars in its own shops, while the Great Northern is to construct 500 freight cars at its own works.

HOLIDAY POULTRY ON ICE.

Amount in Storage in New Jersey Increases 2,000,000 Pounds.

Special to The New York Times.

TRENTON, N. J., Dec. 11.—At the end of November there were 5,816,021 pounds of poultry in cold storage plants in New Jersey, an increase of more than 2,000,000 pounds during the month, the State Department of Health reported today. An increase is customary at this period of the year in anticipation of the holiday trade.

The amount of frozen fish increased from 3,008,796 pounds to 4,258,065 during the month, and the quantity of meat from 3,502,827 to 3,694,262 pounds.

There was a drop in storage butter, cheese and crate eggs. Butter was reduced from 3,079,371 to 1,222,391 pounds, eggs from 305,993 cases to 174,755 cases, and cheese from 1,174,272 pounds to 1,032,922.

Sugar Price Made Firm at 6.40.

The American, National, Warner, Lowry and McCahan refineries announced yesterday that sales of refined sugar would be firm at 6.40. This was the previous list price, but sales were made as low as 6.25. Action in making the price firm followed signing by President Machado of Cuba of the decree restricting the Cuban sugar crop to 4,500,000 tons. Sugar futures closed twelve to fifteen points up on the week.

TRADING IRREGULAR ON CURB MARKET

Declines in Several Stocks Are Counterbalanced by Gains in Others.

NEW HIGH POINTS REACHED

Victor and New Woolworth Shares Make Records—Renewed Buying of Sugar Issues.

Exhibiting reactionary tendencies after an early period of strength, the Curb Market later closed irregular yesterday, but bullish demonstrations in special issues served to balance the list and the undertone in the main appeared to be unimpaired. Setbacks in certain pivotal stocks were due to technical causes, as, for instance, profit-taking for over the week-end.

One of the outstanding strong spots was Victor Talking Machine, which quickened its upward trend with a gain of 5 points to 129, a new high for the year. Woolworth new also ruled strong early and made a top for its current movement at 130¾, but later the issue eased. Baking shares continued to be in demand at advancing levels and Warner Brothers Pictures improved. Renewed buying in sugar shares was reflected in higher prices for Central Aguirre and Fajardo. Johns-Manville added a few points to its value.

South American oils continued to feature the petroleum section, although fluctuations were less attractive than they have been. Public utilities just about held their own on a moderate trade.

Another large turnover in bonds prevailed at steady quotations.

Rulings in Curb Exchange.

The New York Curb Exchange has ruled that contracts in Oswego River Power Company five-year 6s must be settled on Dec. 15 by delivery of definitive debentures. It has also ruled that until further notice transactions in the old capital stock of the Y. Oil & Gas Company, par $1, may be settled by delivery of either certificates of par value of $1 or by certificates of par value of $25, and that if the latter certificates are used delivery must be on the basis of one share of new stock for each twenty-five shares of old.

Net Loss by Warner Pictures.

Warner Brothers Pictures, Inc., and subsidiaries report for the five months ended Aug. 28, 1926, a net loss of $379,096, after interest and other charges. The profit and loss deficit on that date was $1,264,839. Operating loss for the period was $133,905, while extraordinary income totaled $159,798.

FAVOR SALE OF EXCHANGE.

Members of Produce Market Thus Far Polled 10 to 1 for Deal.

Approval of the plan to sell the real estate holdings of the New York Produce Exchange seemed assured yesterday by the responses that have been received thus far to the questionnaire sent out to members. A large majority of the membership apparently favors selling the property. Unofficially the vote thus far is said to be about ten to one.

The Exchange has before it an offer of $11,000,000 for the property at the lower end of Broadway. Definite action on the deal will be taken within a few days.

Beneficial Loan's Profits Rise.

The Beneficial Loan Society (general) reports new loans of $1,389,185 in November against $1,127,559 in November, 1925. Operating profits after expenses, including credit insurance, was $139,271 against $123,769.

Foreign Buying of Chemicals Gains.

Foreign buying of American industrial chemicals has been increasing steadily, according to the Oil, Paint and Drug Reporter. The inability of English manufacturers to turn out the usual quantities resulted in a larger demand for copper sulphate from South America and Mexico. Soda products, such as caustic and ash, have also come in for attention, with European buyers in the forefront. Domestic demand for industrial chemicals was exceptionally good last week.

UTILITY COMPANIES MERGE.

Central and Southern Interests Unite to Operate in 17 States.

LEXINGTON, Ky., Dec. 11 (AP).—Consolidation of the Central Public Utility Service Company and the Southern Gas and Power Corporation was announced today at the latter's offices here.

The merged company, which will be headed by A. E. Pierce of Chicago, will control gas, electric and water companies in seventeen States and in the Canadian Province of New Brunswick. It was said that the consolidation was effected at a meeting this week at the Central company's office in Philadelphia.

The Central company operates in New York, Illinois, Indiana, Michigan, Wisconsin, Maine and New Brunswick, and the Southern concern has holdings in New York, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Virginia, West Virginia, New Hampshire, Kentucky, North and South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama and Texas.

CAPITAL INCREASE PLANNED.

Cleveland Trust Company May Be Made $16,000,000 Institution.

Stockholders of the Cleveland Trust Company at their annual meeting on Jan. 19, 1927, will vote on a directors' proposal to increase the capital stock from $8,600,000 to $10,000,000. If the increase is ratified the additional stock will be offered to the stockholders at $160 a share on the basis of approximately 16 per cent. of their individual holdings as of April 20, 1927. The time limit for the rights is to be left with the directors, but it is understood that payment will be required in the latter part of June.

This increase will give the institution a combined capital and surplus of approximately $16,000,000, President Harris Creech says. It will be the sixth increase in capital effected by the bank since its organization thirty-two years ago. The last one was made when the Lake Shore and Garfield Banks were merged in 1922.

When $1 Equals $2

BLUE SKY promoters urge you to "Double Your Money"—but 99 times out of 100 you lose it, for they ask you to gamble in empty hopes.

There is only one sensible and practical way to make a dollar grow into two, and this is by purchasing values in America's growing enterprises—enterprises built on sound foundations.

Had you bought such values in 1924 the growth resulting from America's marvelous financial and industrial expansion would in many instances have given you 100% profit.

For instance, had you bought Baltimore & Ohio, as The Financial World suggested in its May 15, 1924, issue, for $53 you could sell it today for $106, or Philadelphia Co. for $43.50 you could get $87, or General Motors for $56 (August 1, 1924, issue) now worth more than $200.

Those few illustrations indicate that intelligent investors need not chase the "Blue Bird Get Rich Quick Lure," for they can find ample opportunity in substantial recognizable values.

For more than 24 years The Financial World has sought out such substantial values for its subscribers. By thus profitably guiding them it is the indispensable counselor of more than 25,000 investors and is established as "America's Premier Investment Weekly."

Its unusual success is based on its unbiased appraisals of values, business conditions and financial situations. You too will sense it if you send for and read but one issue.

If you will let your opinion be shaped by its sound editorial policy and specific recommendations, and rely more on its unprejudiced advice, it should be reflected in greater profits from your investments.

COTTON MOVES UP IN LIGHT TRADING

Closes With Net Gain of 4 to 7 Points—Spot Transactions Fall Off.

UNDERTONE REMAINS STEADY

Trade Price-Fixing Orders Absorb Contracts—Hedge Selling Is Limited.

Under a moderate volume of business cotton held within narrow limits again yesterday and closed at a net gain of 4 to 7 points. The feature of the session was the fact that most active trading occurred on the opening and at the close of the day. Execution of trade price-fixing orders by houses with mill connections absorbed contracts and maintained a steady undertone, with light Southern hedge selling when compared with the pressure prevailing ten days ago. Spot transactions at Southern markets fell off to 17,600 bales, smallest sales in several months.

Reports from the South reflect a limited quantity of better grades for sale at present prices, despite the enormous crop grown this year. Dealers have sold ahead in many instances and advices from both Eastern and Western sections of the belt indicate absence of offerings of deliverable grades. In order to fill commitments, it has been necessary to purchase round blocks and select out the cotton wanted, leaving spot houses with a quantity of lower grades for which there is less immediate demand. Holders of better grades have shown little disposition to take advantage of banking facilities afforded by the various State organizations and the problem of financing low grades is a more difficult one.

Reports from Memphis indicate that the quantity of "snap" cotton has increased to such an extent in recent receipts that prices are low and many growers have returned to the old method of picking or are leaving cotton in the fields.

British Board of Trade figures reported exports of yarns amounting to 15,000,000 pounds during November, compared with 14,000,000 last year, and exports of cloths amounting to 276,000,000 yards, against 367,000,000 last year. Private cable advices reflect little improvement in the trade outlook in Lancashire either in domestic or export circles.

The following shows the statistical position of cotton figured up to yesterday morning by the Financial Chronicle:

ELECTRIC INDUSTRY QUIET.

Sales of Heavy Equipment Drop, but Year Is Expected to Show a Gain.

Fairly heavy sales in small apparatus, switches and kindred material featured the electrical industry last week, and while inquiry for heavy equipment was in evidence, few important orders were placed, according to the Electrical World.

"In New England trade was quiet, except for the activity in retail and jobbing quarters," the periodical reports. "The call for control apparatus and motors has been less active in the New York district. In the Southeast the buying in practically all lines continues fairly active, with appliance business particularly satisfactory. Industrial plants were steady buyers in the St. Louis market, and central station companies are purchasing considerable quantities of distribution equipment in the Middle West. On the Pacific Coast sales were well distributed among the different branches of industry.

"The total volume of business in 1926 in the electrical industry is expected to show a fair increase over last year, notwithstanding the recent decline in sales of heavy equipment."

New Office for Chemical Bank.

The Chemical National Bank has leased space ina building in the course of construction at Fifth Avenue and Fifty-fourth Street. The new quarters will be opened for business about April 1, 1927, according to Percy H. Johnston, President. The bank now has two uptown offices, in addition to its main quarters at 216 Broadway.

Christmas Bonus by Liberty Bank.

Directors of the Liberty National Bank have authorized payment of a Christmas bonus to officers and employes, it was announced yesterday by Robert W. Daniel, President,

TWO TERMINAL UNITS OPEN AT PHILADELPHIA

B. & O. and Reading Expect to Have Third in Operation by Middle of February.

With the formal opening of a new perishable products terminal at Philadelphia the Baltimore & Ohio and the Reading railroads, joint owners, now have one of the largest freight terminals in the world. Speeding construction so as to have the new facilities in service for part of the Fall movement two of the main units of the terminal are now completed and the third unit will be in service by the middle of February.

The terminal includes a large auction sales building, a large private sales building, cold storage warehouse and an extensive team delivery yard, which together will represent an investment of about $4,000,000.

The new terminal lies close to the waterfront on the Delaware River and extends from Delaware Avenue on the east to Weccacoe Avenue on the west, and from Jackson Street on the north to Ritner Street on the south, covering about twenty-three acres. The principal advantages of this location are that it is practically in the centre of the city's terminal area on the most important waterfront avenue, and that it is ideally situated for easy access by both the Baltimore & Ohio and the Reading.

In this respect the Baltimore & Ohio has access to the west end of the terminal from its own tracks in Vandalia Street, while the Reading has direct access to the east end over the tracks of the Philadelphia belt line which lie in Delaware Avenue.

These two roads, which will probably eventually be merged under the plan for building a greater Baltimore & Ohio system, will concentrate the delivery of their perishable freight in Philadelphia at this new terminal. It is expected that the greater part of the fruit handled, coming from California and Florida as it does, will be brought over the Baltimore & Ohio, while the greater part of the vegetables will be brought over the Reading.

In general the auction sales building will be used throughout the year for the display and delivery of all perishable produce sold at auction, while the private sales building will be used for the handling of such perishable products as are not customarily sold at auction.

RUBBER FUTURES HIGHER.

Market Here Closes 40 Points Up—Trading Firm in London.

Crude rubber futures continued to work higher yesterday. A better tone in the outside markets and a firm London market combined to impart a strong undertone to trading on the Exchange. Business was in moderate volume, thirty-eight lots changing hands, and the closing level was 40 points above Friday's finals.

It is expected that the Rubber Association report to be issued tomorrow will show consumption figures about 10,000 tons under imports. Rubber afloat, it has been estimated, will amount to about 5,000 tons.

In London, prices held firm to higher in quiet trading.

Range of prices for the active deliveries traded in on the local Exchange follow:

WHEAT HAS A RALLY ON BUYING AT CLOSE

Prices Recover Some of Early Loss, Closing Unchanged to ¾ Off—December Weakest.

BULLS BUYERS OF CORN

Chicago Traders Cause Upward Move After Slight Declines in Early Trading.

Special to the New York Times.

CHICAGO, Dec. 11.—Trade in wheat continues largely of a local character, with the news favoring a lower range of values. Prices declined around 1 cent early on May, with all deliveries at a new low for the week, with a rally toward the last on buying against daily and weekly bids, short covering and the strength in coarse grains. The finish was unchanged to ¾ cent lower, with December showing the greatest decline.

Winnipeg was weak and 1 cent lower with the pool credited with selling on all the minor upturns. Buenos Aires was not affected by the Government report and closed 1 cent lower, with Rosario down 1½ cent. Liverpool lost ⅜@¾d and reported increased pressure of Argentine grain and a slow demand.

There is more of a two-sided market in wheat and the coarse grains, with a disposition on the part of a good many local professionals to buy corn and oats and sell wheat, while those who specialize entirely in wheat are about evenly divided. Longs who failed to get out of their December wheat early in the week, when it was selling at the same price as May, were unloading today at 1¾ to 2 cents discount, while those who bought December and sold May at the same figures recently were taking profits.

World Trade Bearish.

The world's wheat trade is mainly bearish, with Argentine news a factor. The Argentine official crop suggests 217,000,000 bushels, with an exportable surplus of 142,000,000 bushels. Carryover there is 35,000,000 bushels, so that total supplies are 251,000,000 bushels for the season. Cables reported heavy rains interrupting field work, with roads impassable, which had a strengthening influence. London cables reported Russia pressing sales of wheat to the Continent, and houses who had this cable were heavy sellers of wheat here.

Expectations are that the visible supply on Monday will decrease 2,000,000 bushels. Chicago stocks are to decrease 500,000 bushels, and Kansas City the same amount with the Minneapolis and Duluth stocks also showing fair decreases. World's shipments are estimated at 11,700,000 bushels for the week, a decrease of 1,000,000 bushels from the previous week and a decrease of 1,000,000 bushels from last year.

Primary receipts today, 900,000 bushels; week ago, 1,157,000; last year, 1,413,000. Shipments, 664,000; week ago, 489,000; last year, 1,257,000.

Corn Closed Unchanged.

Corn held within a range of ½-cents and after being slightly lower early rallied sharply, and closed unchanged to ½-cent higher with local bulls aggressive buyers.

Corn traders who are bearish are looking for an increase in receipts from the country within the next three weeks, of sufficient volume to be of depressing influence. On the other hand, a number of large local professionals who are bullish and long, expect an increase in the outside buying interest which has shown a disposition to take hold on breaks.

Receipts at primary points for the week increased over 1,600,000 bushels, compared with the previous week, and were the lightest at this time in more than five years.

The season of lake navigation has closed with 50,000,000 bushels of grain shipped from Chicago since last April. Primary arrivals of corn today 526,000; week ago, 584,000; last year, 1,242,000. Shipments, 357,000; week ago, 310,000; last year, 428,000. Oats closed ⅛-cent lower to ⅛-cent higher with local bulls the best buyers, while rye was ⅛-cent lower in sympathy with wheat.

WHEAT FUTURES DROP HERE.

Market Materially Off After Day of Bearish News Abroad.

The wheat futures market on the New York Produce Exchange turned heavy in undertone yesterday, and prices declined about 1 cent a bushel at the outset. Several rallies occurred during the short session, but as news continued against values, and bearish sentiment set in deeper and deeper, the market closed materially off from the level of the week.

Export demand was less active, the bulk of it being for Canadian wheat. Freight rates were distinctly weak the latter part of the week, and served to restrict foreign buying, while European cables spoke of pressure of Russian and Argentine wheats. The interior movement was moderate during the week, although some increase was noted in the Southwestern run.

The New York Times

Forecast and Review

Financial—Commercial—Business

THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL FORECAST AND REVIEW WILL BE PUBLISHED AS A PART OF THE REGULAR EDITION OF THE TIMES JANUARY 1, 1927.

The retrospect of 1926 will be a condensed chronological review, showing the important financial events during the year, together with political and other occurrences distinctly bearing on the financial markets. This register of important happenings in sequence makes it especially valuable for preservation and reference to business and financial houses, educational institutions and libraries.

Forecasts and reviews by expert correspondents at the principal American grain, cotton and steel markets, will be another valuable feature.

Complete tables of the transactions, range of prices and total sales in bond and stock markets for the year, and full comparative tabulations by months of the courses of the various foreign exchange rates during 1926, will be included.

London, Paris, Berlin, Amsterdam and Rome financial correspondents of The Times will forecast the New Year from those markets.

More than any other publication of similar character, this reliable and authoritative annual financial summary of The Times attracts the attention of leaders in the business and financial communities throughout the country.

The New York Times publishes more financial advertising than any other newspaper in the world. In eleven months of this year The Times published 2,941,915 agate lines of financial advertising, a greater volume than in any previous year, and 1,471,167 lines in excess of the second New York newspaper. The Times censorship excludes advertising of undesirable firms.

The Merchant's Point of View

BUYING of holiday and gift goods at retail continues to be the principal feature in mercantile business all over the country. A few and unimportant exceptions to reports from different centres in stating that the volume of buying is larger than was the case last year and that the prospects for a good trade are very favorable. The cold spell which ushered in last week brought with it also a call for warmer garments in both cloth and fur and quickened the men's wear trade in underwear, overcoats, mufflers and gloves. At the same time it served as a reminder to those who are given to flitting the Winter away from cold climates and whose thoughts are now turning to apparel suitable for Southern resort wear. In the primary markets, meanwhile, the usual dullness incident to this time of year is broken only by numerous though small orders, mostly for filling-in purposes. It is considered that the bulk of the buying for Spring and beyond must be left over after the turn of the year, when future demand will be more pronounced than it is and when greater stability of values can be assured. About the only thing on which all factors seem agreed is that there is no prospect of a change in the cautious buying policy which has been the rule for several months past, and this betokens a rather tame and drawn-out season.

Shifts in the Country's Foreign Trade.

Certain figures in the most recent statistics of the foreign trade of this country are not without interest. In October, for instance, the value of the exports was $3,821,770 less than in the corresponding month of 1925, while that of the imports was $4,276,451 more than in October, 1925. For the ten months' period ended with October the exports were $129,747,940 less than in the same period a year before, while the imports were greater by $245,057,735. The result was to reduce the favorable merchandise balance of trade from $549,219,831 last year to $164,814,096 this year. If the proportion is kept up for the remaining two months, the excess of exports over imports will be little more than $180,000,000. Should this be the case, it will be the smallest balance shown in any year since 1896, when the amount was $102,882,000. The record favorable balance was in 1920, when it totaled $4,016,061,000. Part of the drop in exports during October this year was due to the lower price of cotton, which accounted for a difference of about $60,000,000. The principal export increases during the month were one of about $17,500,000 in grains and another of $20,000,000 in coal, the latter due to the British coal strike. On the side of the imports, those in October showed a drop in rubber of about $25,000,000, which more than offset these gains; wool, $3,000,000; coffee, $7,750,000; sugar, $9,000,000, and raw silk, $3,800,000. The value of exports in the month was due for a jump of about $47,000,000 in trade to Europe. In the imports increase occurred in those from Europe and North and South America, with decreases from the other portions of the globe.

Is General Price Reduction to Begin?

Is there any significance in the general course of prices which the raw materials of the textiles are showing? Put in another way, the question would be whether the prevailing weakness in such prices is merely temporary and the result of simultaneous overproduction or whether it marks a trend that is likely to be permanent? It just so happens that, with a record crop of cotton, there is also one of jute and that the supplies of wool and raw silk are exceedingly abundant. The same thing is true of the latest of the fibres, formerly called artificial silk and now becoming more generally known as rayon, the prices of which have also been sharply reduced. That all these reductions should follow one another has set some people to thinking. It has been felt that prices of commodities in general have been too high, never having recovered from the inflation of the war period. Sooner or later, most people are convinced, must come a downward trend. As in movements of this kind in the past, changes in prices of commodities do not come together at the same time for all of them. It would be manifest in some one or special group of them, with more or less resistance from the others, until finally practically all of them were realigned at ratios which experience had shown to be logical and just. Has this process begun with the textile raw materials or are the present happenings merely fortuitous?

End of National Dry Goods Jobbing.

A chapter in merchandising closed with the recent dissolution of the old Claflin house. It had been the largest and was the last of the national dry goods jobbing concerns in this city. When it began its existence retailers from all over the country came here twice a year to replenish their supplies and at the same time to get acquainted with the newest in piece goods, notions, &c. It was before the time of the development of the garment industry and when dresses and other articles of women's garb were usually of home manufacture with the occasional aid of a seamstress. After a while, as the country developed, big jobbing houses were established in other cities, notably in Chicago and St. Louis. Then many retailers found it more convenient to patronize the concerns nearer their respective localities. A great deal of the trade of the Mississippi Valley was lost to this city in spite of the efforts of traveling salesmen from here. In the same way the South and the Pacific Coast States had dry goods jobbing houses established within their boundaries to care for their own retailers. Then it became only a question of time for the local jobbers of this city to restrict their territories or to go out of business. Most of them chose the former alternative and are still continuing at it. What has hastened the result was the change in the methods of buying from the former method of ordering far in advance. Now retailers are obliged to come to the market more frequently and their purchases are rarely in advance of current needs. For this kind of trading the local jobber is found to be the most convenient.

International Arbitration in Woolens.

Settling trade disputes by arbitration instead of resorting to the courts has become the practice in a number of the industries. It was found that, even when recourse was had to the law, the Magistrate before whom a dispute came lacked the necessary technical knowledge to adjudicate on it and had to call in the aid of trade experts. So, less than twoscore years ago, the Chamber of Commerce of Bradford, England, established a Board of Arbitration to settle disputes on woolens. This body has been working since in a very satisfactory way. One result was that the mere knowledge that a controversy would be examined by really competent experts automatically reduced the number of disputes. In recent years arbitration was requested by firms in Continental Europe doing business with British concerns. In 1924 an agreement for arbitrating woolen disputes was entered into with French representatives and last year similar ones with those of Belgium and Germany. Finally, in October last, a conference was held in Turin, Italy. Great Britain, France, Belgium, Germany and Italy were represented and entered into mutual agreements for arbitration of disputes over woolens. Hopes were expressed that Czechoslovakia and this country would soon join the movement. It is said that a stumbling block in the way of this country giving adhesion is a provision requiring disputes to be heard in the country where the controversy arose. A greater one probably is the difficulty of getting enough dealers to agree to any form of arbitration with foreign concerns. It has been hard enough to try and have them do so even with domestic ones.

Cotton Supplies and Prices of Cottons.

If to an estimate of ten or twelve million bales of cotton a later one made an addition of two or three hundred thousand bales, the result would be very manifest in the price quotations. But when, as was the case during the past week, an addition of about the quantity stated was made to a prediction of over 18,000,000 bales, the result was quite negligible. Nobody appeared to be excited about it because it did not materially change conditions. The problem still remains as to what is to become of the great supply. With cotton as cheap as it is, there is no doubt that more use will be made of it and for more purposes and, in the end, what at first sight seemed a misfortune may work out for a lasting good. An encouraging sign is the disposition to make the best of the situation. For the future the most hopeful determination is to plant fewer acres to cotton and to grow more and better cotton to the acre. If this is done the price will cut less figure and the outcome will be a profit. The final estimate of the crop will have a decided effect so far as the goods market is concerned. Both buyers and sellers of cottons have been awaiting it so as to discover a safe and stable trading basis. The immediate effect was not especially marked because of the season of the year, but it will be more apparent in a few weeks, when the bulk of the buying will be in progress. Gray goods continue to show a softening tendency, but the trading in them is light. Gingham prices have been made on the existing basis to continue under guarantee to April 1. This action is similar to that taken recently with regard to printed goods. Lower levels have been fixed for tickings and toweling. Prices for denims will probably soon be set to correspond with the lower cost of cotton and there will be other reductions of the same kind. Heavyweight underwear offerings will be priced this week. The reductions expected are from 10 to 12 per cent.

Conditions in Wool and Woolens.

Varied reports have come from the auction sales of wool in progress in different places. The most reliable appear to show that the sagging in prices still continues. A feature of the sales at London has been the large amount of withdrawals of offerings for want of adequate bids. In this country the sales which have taken place lately have been mostly in the buyers' favor. Purchasers do not seem to be eager unless prices are to their liking and they are fully aware of the fact that they can get supplies whenever they need them. That there is no likelihood of a slump is due to the fact that the large stocks existent are still strongly held. This condition of the raw material market prompts the general belief that there is no probability of a rise in prices of woolens for the next heavyweight season and that the chances rather favor a slight recession. It will, however, be after the beginning of the new year before the formal openings of fabrics for next Fall and Winter take place. Meanwhile, there is much ordering yet to be done on Spring goods, the bulk of which will be sought in the next month or two. In the women's wear lines there is still some uncertainty as to the prospects because of the labor situation. This ought, however, to be settled within a short time. In any event, with the "inside" shops being now free of labor troubles, there will be little difficulty in sufficient supplies being available when the selling season starts.

WANT GRIP ON THE ELUSIVE CUSTOMER

Regaining Patrons Once Lost a Problem Requiring Both Patience and Skill.

Two things, according to a local expert on merchandising matters, are not being given the proper attention by executives of department stores in many parts of the country. One of these is the cost of their labor turnover. The other is the far greater cost of customer turnover. Of the two, the man in question said yesterday, the former probably receives more attention than the latter.

"To begin with," he went on, "the cost of labor turnover is more tangible. Many stores have accurate data concerning the expense of hiring and training workers, more particularly sales employes, only to lose them through 'quits' or 'fires' before they have rendered service commensurate with the cost of their training. Because they have something into which they can figuratively set their teeth, executives of these stores are doing the best they can to hold down changes in their personnel. Many stores, however, do not devote enough attention to this phase of their business, apparently failing to realize that every cut in costs usually means a corresponding increase in net profits.

"The cost of customer turnover receives still less attention, for it is practically impossible to figure it. By customer turnover is meant the customers who are made for the stores by advertising and other promotion features and lost through some dissatisfaction with the merchandise or service.

"The losses arising from this source are particularly hard to trace when the business of a store is done largely or wholly on a cash basis, for in this case there is no way of identifying those customers who have been lost. Nor is it much easier for a store to determine its customer turnover loss when a great part of its business is conducted on a charge basis, although the inactive account (not closed account) files of the credit department offer direct access to the names and addresses of its former patrons on this basis.

"The question may naturally come up as to why the business of these customers is not gone after again. The answer is that sporadic attempts are made by many stores to revive their inactive accounts, but that for some reason or other, they are not made in a way which produces maximum results. The general procedure is to send an ordinary form letter to the customer asking her to tell the reason why the account became inactive, assuring her that the store will be only too glad to make things right.

"This stunt, as I see it, has four things wrong with it. First, it has been done over and over again. Second, the wording of most of such letters is too formal to awaken any desire in the customer to tell what the trouble is, if any. Third, such letters are useless in great part because, if the customer felt like complaining, the complaint would likely have been written (or made personally) at the time of the incident which resulted in the loss of the customer's patronage. Fourth, and maybe the most important, the form letter method of trying to awaken inactive accounts is 'cheap,' and it must not be thought for a moment that the customer does not realize this fact.

"In fact, there is probably nothing more irritating to many women than to receive a letter which they know is going to hundreds of others. Women are strong individualists and a separately typed letter makes a far stronger appeal than any product of the duplicating machine. Yet even individual letters lose their appeal if they are signed, 'John Jones, President,' with a rubber stamp.

"To my mind, there is only one class of former charge customers to whom trade-soliciting letters can rightly be sent, and that is made up of patrons who have moved from the city in which the account was opened, who dealt with the store by mail for a time and then stopped. In cases such as these there is no reason why individual letters, properly phrased and indicating a real desire to be of service to the customer, should not be effective. The value of the out-of-town patron, especially one who is so satisfied with her treatment by a store as to become a builder of good-will for it in the community in which she lives, is not a thing that has to be demonstrated to the merchant who knows his business.

"Right here I can imagine some one asking what practical suggestion I have to make about reviving the business of charge customers who have not moved away. My reply is that I would have the more recent of these accounts gone over carefully and analyzed. I would select from them 50 or 100 of the most desirable-looking and would then set a competent, well-bred woman solicitor on their trail. I believe that the results from such a canvass would be surprising and would offset by far the cost of soliciting, even if only goodwill were built up at first. Sufficient time would have to be given the solicitor to show results, and in choosing her particular care would have to be taken.

"Some objection to this method may be made on the ground that it is beneath the store's dignity thus to solicit trade. If it were, I would reply that it is also below the store's dignity to send out cheap form letters for the purpose. Certainly personal solicitation is no more beneath a store's dignity than it was, and still is with some stores, to send around investigators before opening new accounts.

"Getting back to the disease and forgetting the cure for a moment, I would like to touch upon one very fertile source of customer turnover. This is the part-time sales person and the employe who is taken on temporarily to meet the Christmas or some other expected rush. Unless time and pains are taken to impress upon such employes the need of proper and courteous service they are, speaking figuratively, commercial dynamite.

"Even time and pains won't always remove the danger. This is especially true of the temporary employe who, feeling that the store's interest in her is only fleeting, makes her interest in the store even more fleeting, if any ever exists. These workers, fairly sure that they can get away with almost anything that is not too 'raw' in the hustle and bustle of the season, are not only likely to loaf on the job but almost to go out of their way to irritate customers with nerves already on the ragged edge from the difficulties of shopping in crowds. The latter have no way of knowing that the offending employe is not one of the store's regular personnel, and the business and good will of the store suffer as a result.

"The part-time employes, especially young married women, are also likely to take an offensive attitude unless they had sales training prior to their marriage. This attitude is heightened by the fact that, having behind them men who are required by law, if not by desire, to support them, they do not have to work if they do not want to. If, in their own eyes, they are doing the store a favor by working there, it is not difficult to see what the effect will be when the going gets rough around holiday time."

GOODS THAT ATTRACT BUYERS FOR STORES

Among Them Are Suits and Coats, Dresses, Millinery, Underwear and Negligees.

In his special market report, Alfred Fanti, resident buyer, says: "It is the opinion of a number of buyers now in the market that the tailored suit will enjoy considerable vogue during the Spring. Manufacturers of higher and popular priced merchandise are according the tailleur a prominent place in their new collections, and stores in certain sections of the country have already placed orders for suits retailing within the price range of $25 and $29.50.

"Two-piece suits with short box jacket and pleated skirts are being shown in tweed, wool frisks, novelty check patterns combined with plain cloth, men's suiting and navy twill. Distinctive details on many new models are silk braid edgings and contrasting colored pipings of cloth or leather. Three-piece costumes, consisting of skirt and jacket with blouse or sleeveless vest, are also seen in all silk or cloth combined with silk.

"Stores are now reducing cloth coats which remain in stock. There is little wholesale buying at present, most retailers being inclined to wait until January to purchase these garments at bigger price reductions to offset the losses sustained earlier because of unfavorable selling weather.

"For January and February retailing, a number of stores are purchasing new Spring coats in smart fabrics and furs and having them warmly interlined. The type most favored is the dressier sports coat developed in novelty woolen fabrics and generously trimmed with such furs as calfskin, pony, twin beaver, black and white monkey and furs in the natural colorings.

"There has been increased activity in better dresses for mid-Winter retailing. Afternoon dresses of crêpe Romaine or crêpe Elizabeth are wanted in the soft colors of monkey skin, French beige, the rose tones and particularly in the new blue shades. Gray is again gaining favor and combinations of two tones of this color, such as pearl and fog gray, are receiving attention from buyers. In the popular priced line there is a steady call for black satin dresses with embroidered peasant or Jack o' Lantern sleeves.

"Millinery departments report many sales of faille hats in high shades, trimmed with pedaline braid or embroidery, retailing within the price range of $5 to $10. Black satin hats with touches of pedaline and side trims of ostrich are also selling well. Supple handkerchief felt is an important medium for small close-fitting hats which have no brim in back and a very narrow brim in front close to the crown. These models retailing for $6 up are selling best in the beige colorings, French blue and brighter tones of red. Tailored ombré visca hats with narrow brims and draped crowns are an advanced Spring item which stores are now selling for $8.50 up.

"An unusually big holiday business is reported in the sale of lace-trimmed crêpe de chine underwear in high shades selling for $2.95 up. The demand is also large for fancy glove silk undergarments. Popular rayon numbers are vests at $1 and bloomers selling for $1.35 to $1.50. A novelty which is selling well at $12.95 is the evening slip of georgette with scalloped tiers studded with rhinestones. This new number is being ordered in black, white and pastel shades.

"Fancy negligées in a wide range of colors and materials are proving successful holiday sellers within the price range of $10.95 and $29.50, those of black satin with bright-colored trimmings being most wanted. Manish robes of striped flannel and quilted satin robes are also popular numbers.

"For holiday selling there is considerable call for ladies' fancy wool and rayon hose retailing for $1, as well as for full-fashioned silk and wool hose within the price range of $1.50 and $1.95.

GREETING WAY OF THE SALES PERSON

Tactful Method of Approaching a Store Customer an Aid to Selling Goods.

Not the least important factor contributing to the success of any retail establishment is the method of "approach" to a customer that is used. Some stores have no set policy, but leave it entirely to the sales person, with the result that irritation crops up which is frequently fatal to the successful completion of a sale. But most retailers, large and small, have realized the importance of the first contact of the customer with the sales clerk and have endeavored to map out a procedure satisfactory both to the store and the customer.

In large department stores the rule in many departments is to allow the customer to "speak first." This is based on the assumption that the customer wants to look over the merchandise and does not want to be bothered at every turn by importunate sales clerks. Once the customer displays her interest in any item of merchandise, however, the sales person, in these stores, is taught to follow up the indicated lead tactfully. In certain lines of department store merchandise the customer usually knows what she wants, and tells the clerk at once. Then the latter usually has very little to say or do beyond the actual showing of the merchandise, which usually sells itself.

In other retail establishments, including several big department stores, the clerks are taught to approach the customer immediately upon the latter's appearance. This is done even in street-floor departments, where there are usually a large number of customers who are "lookers," although potential purchasers as well. Advocates of this method say that it results in added sales and keeps the sales clerks "on their toes."

It is claimed, however, and comments of shoppers are cited in support, that under this plan sales clerks are too eager to make sales and bother customers unnecessarily. This is held to be particularly true in certain departments where there is a natural tendency for customers to browse around or make careful selection of the goods they have in mind. Thus, in the department handling books, on the main floor, a customer tells of being bothered by no fewer than four clerks within almost as many minutes. This sort of thing irritates some types of buyers, who, if left to themselves, would more quickly make up their minds as to their purchases.

In certain lines of merchandise, such as ready-to-wear, the direct approach has been found desirable and, in fact, necessary. This is so if for no other purpose than to learn what the customer has in mind and properly to direct her. If she indicates, however, that she is inclined to be undecided and wants to examine the garments at her leisure, the sales girl should acquiesce. There are numerous customers who like to look the garments over, either alone or with those accompanying them and without the aid of the sales clerk. The clever girl will realize this and will allow the customer free rein in her selection. From time to time, however, she will go over to the customer and courteously offer any assistance that may be desired. When it appears that the customer has made a choice, the sale can be successfully closed to her entire satisfaction.

In some stores, notably specialty shops, this procedure is not generally followed because the customer who patronizes these stores usually wants the expert aid and assistance of the sales clerk. Here the best method of approach to the customer has been found to be the "intimate" one. If the customer's name is known, she is usually greeted as Mrs. So-and-so by the sales girl, and this attitude is maintained all through the process of selling. It is this "intimacy," in fact, which is one of the most appealing features of the specialty shop as contrasted with the large department store.

In the smaller stores, those of the neighborhood variety for example, the approach is again one of more or less intimacy. There are, however, numerous opportunities for giving irritation to the customer. Chief among these is an insistence upon calling attention to merchandise other than that which the customer actually came in to purchase. Within certain limits "suggestive selling" is generally regarded as a desirable procedure. But when item after item is suggested and even lugged physically before the customer, who may be in a hurry, certain types of customers are apt to become weary.

It is generally agreed that in men's furnishings stores, particularly in the large chain emporiums, the art of the approach to the customer has been worked out to a very fine degree. One difficulty that has arisen lies in the tendency of some of the "high powered" salesmen to have a high opinion of their sales capabilities and to slight customers' preferences while substituting their own.

Complaint has been made more than once by customers that, even before they were allowed to indicate their individual choices, they were taken in hand by a salesman who tried to sell what he thought was the right things for them. This is being combated in the leading stores. With some customers so-called "ritzy" and "high hat" attitudes may go. They may be impressed with the sartorial information the clerk tries to dispense and the selections he wants to make. But there are many others who want their own choices and do not care to have their personality overridden by a salesman who is too much of a "go-getter."

GARMENT MARK-DOWNS.

Query Whether the Style or Price Is the Biggest Factor.

An interesting question came up here a few days ago in the course of a conversation concerning "bad guesses" on the part of buyers. It was this: When merchandise, especially women's apparel, has to be marked down, is it because the selection of the buyer is wrong or because the price at which it is originally offered is wrong?

In asking the question, the man who brought the matter up expressed the opinion that the latter was usually the case, pointing out that if the article was wrong in itself, especially in its style, it could not be sold at any price. If this were not so, he added, the frequently repeated statement that women will not purchase at any figure garments that do not conform to the mode in line and color is in error.

Although no clean-cut agreement was reached on the matter by the group in which it came up, there was a disposition to believe that, buyers' opinions to the contrary, many women put more emphasis on the prices asked for the goods than on their strictly style element. This, it was argued, is apparently proved by the fact that only a very small part of any ready-to-wear apparel stock ever is wholly unsalable.

RAW SILK MARKETS.

Slight Rise in Price at Yokohama a Feature of the Week.

The raw silk market at Yokhama yesterday closed active and higher. The stronger tone developed during the last two days of the week with the result that the market closed 20 yen higher as compared with last Monday. Sales on the Bourse amounted to 5,210 bales and in the open market to 6,340 bales, according Berizzi Brothers Company. Exchange held steady at 49⅞ for ninety days' sight draft, New York.

The week in the local market was fairly active and improvement in buying was noted. Prices closed on the basis of $6 for double extra cracks and $5.80 for best No. 1s to extras. A more active demand for Spring silk goods is gradually getting underway.

At Canton the market turned very strong overnight, being sympathetically affected by the rise in Japan raws. For 14-16s the closing cable prices yesterday were $4.30 to $4.35 and $3.85 to $3.90.

A nominal market continued at Shanghai. Tussahs were held at $3.10 to $3.15 and tsatlees at $4.50. Milan was also quiet, prices being regarded as too high for the American market.

FAVOR LUSTROUS CLOTHS.

Reason for Popularity of Fabrics of the Bolivia Order.

Although dull-finished cloths retain leadership in the higher-priced woolen coatings and dress fabrics, an increasing amount of interest is being shown in semi-lustrous and lustrous fabrics, according to N. J. Jackson of this city.

In discussing the market in rayon waste, which is used in the manufacture of lustrous cloths, particularly bolivias, he said that many mills have had to adjust their sample lines and are finding it profitable to include fabrics of lustrous appearance.

Dealing specifically with bolivias, Mr. Jackson said they are likely again to cut an important figure during the Fall season. "They are far from passé," he added, "because there has not yet been a weave produced to take their place, at least in the moderate-priced ranges.

"Coupled with the indicated favor for these cloths is the fact that rayon waste, which is largely used to secure the lustrous pile, has gone down in price and is now selling at a level which makes its use very economical."

Dry Goods Wholesalers to Meet.

An unusually comprehensive program has been laid out for the forthcoming annual convention of the National Wholesale Dry Goods Association and its subsidiary bodies. All of the sessions will take place at the Waldorf-Astoria, the meetings of the parent organization being from Jan. 18 to 20. Topics to be discussed by the Wholesalers' Association of Dress Fabric Buyers will come up on Jan. 17, and will be continued on the following day. The notions group meets on Wednesday, with a joint session meeting of all members of the various bodies scheduled for Thursday at 10 A. M. The activities will come to a close with the annual dinner of all associations at the Waldorf that evening at 7 P. M.

Notes on Trade and Industry Abroad

Ban on Garbanzos Exports.

A decree has been issued extending the prohibition on the export of garbanzos (chick-peas) from Mexico until Dec. 1, 1927, instead of Aug. 31, 1927.

Czechoslovak Coal Tar and Oil.

The exportation from Czechoslovakia of coal tar made from lignite, and of coal tar made from lignite, and used for lighting purposes without further distillation, is subject to license from the Ministry of Commerce.

Electric Lines in Switzerland.

The total length of electrified railway lines in Switzerland in 1919 was only .107 kilometers; by 1924 it had reached 610 kilometers, and by the end of 1925 had increased to 900 kilometers. At the present time the total length of electrified lines exceeds 1,000 kilometers of long lines, on which 250 electric locomotives operate regularly.

Construction at Honolulu.

Construction projects for the coming year at Honolulu include harbor improvements, involving an expenditure of $3,000,000; boulevard improvements, estimated at $400,000, and the erection of a war memorial natatorium at Waikiki. Bids for the construction of this memorial will be called for shortly by the Superintendent of Public Works.

New Type of Pavement.

A type of double pavement has been put into use on several important streets in Paris. It consists of a foundation layer of asphalt and a surface layer composed of a mixture of bitumen, rock and asphalt and porphyry gravel, to take the place of asphalt, which is dangerously slippery in wet weather. This surface is slightly corrugated, and both layers are applied hot.

Dike for the Zuyder Zee.

The Government has concluded an agreement with a Dutch company for the construction and the upkeep until completion of a dike which will separate the Zuyder Zee from the North Sea and which will be thirty kilometers long, according to Commercial Attaché J. F. Van Wickel, The Hague, Netherlands. The cost of this dike is estimated in the budget at 80,000,000 florins. (The florin is worth 40 cents).

Timber From Siberia.

It is stated, according to Lloyd's list, that about 3,000,000 feet of timber and 500 cedar logs were part of the cargo brought back by the five ships which formed the Kara Sea Trading Expedition which recently returned to London, ending its 1926 voyage. The expedition is reported to have gone 450 miles up the Yenisei River from Dickson Island further than previously accomplished by any trading ship.

Nothing Dutiable in Letters.

The Postoffice Department has just announced that the importation into the Union of South Africa by letter post of all articles subject to customs duty will be prohibited on and after Jan. 1, 1927. Letters found to contain such articles will be liable to confiscation by the customs authorities. The importation of dutiable goods will be permissible in parcels bearing the usual customs declaration.

Colombian Conditions Good.

A good coffee crop, high prices and plenty of work for the laboring element have resulted in a generally prosperous condition throughout Colombia. The coffee crop this year is estimated by the trade interests at 2,200,000 bags, and next year it is expected that there will be a further increase of approximately 100,000 bags. Merchants in the cities of Bogota, Medelin and Manizales are prosperous and are buying goods freely.

Sericulture in Honduras.

A concession of 2,000 hectares (hectar =about 2.5 acres) of national land and other privileges have been granted by the Honduran National Congress, for the purpose of establishing silk culture in Honduras on a basis such as to make it a national resource. The concessionaire undertakes to import trees and silkworms suitable to the climate and soil and to teach operators to handle them. The concession runs for ten years.

Sisal Cultivation for Haiti.

The Legislature is expected to approve the contract between the Haitian Government and a group of American capitalists interested in the cultivation of sisal in the island. It is planned to devote 20,000 acres to sisal cultivation and to provide for official inspection, grading, and baling of all sisal fiber shipped from Haiti. This enterprise promises to become a leading industry of the island, tending to improve the general economic situation of Haiti.

Where Polish Starch Goes.

Poland produces over 20 per cent. of all the potatoes of the world. It is thus natural that a starch industry should have been developed in that country. In 1925 Poland exported a total of 31,000,000 pounds of starch, of which 30 per cent. went to the United Kingdom, 21 per cent. to Germany, and 4 to 6 per cent. each to Denmark, Austria and France. In 1923 Poland's starch exports amounted to nearly 60,000,000 pounds. The largest producers of starch are near Posen and Wronki, the annual production being 86,000 tons, or 189,000,000 pounds.

Canadian Coal and Coke Tariff.

The Canadian Advisory Tariff Board will hold a public sitting on Jan. 18, 1927, to hear an application covering tariff rates on coal and coke, according to Assistant Trade Commissioner Oliver B. North, Ottawa. The application seeks the imposition of a duty on anthracite screenings imported for steam purposes, a duty on coke imported for metallurgical foundry and domestic uses, abolition of the rebate now granted in the case of coal imported by operators of by-product coke ovens, and an increased duty on bituminous coal.

SALES OF AMERICAN DOLLS.

Substantial Increase of Them Shown This Year Over Last.

Business in American-made dolls has shown a substantial increase this year over that of 1925, according to F. M. Trumpore, sales manager for Fleischaker & Baum of this city. The retail demand for high-priced dolls, he said yesterday, has been considerably larger than that of a year ago.

"One feature of the business done this year," Mr. Trumpore continued, "is the slowness with which the merchandise men for the larger stores confirmed their buyers' orders. In many cases orders placed in April were not confirmed until September, or even later. The result was that the manufacturers have been literally swamped with business. In our own case we have found it necessary to refuse new orders from other than our regular accounts, but even at that we are compelled to run overtime to meet our delivery dates. Character dolls have again had an exceedingly good year, with those of the talking baby type especially favored.

"A feature this year has been the business in 'friendship' dolls for shipment to Japan that has been done as a result of the activities of the Committee on World Friendship Among Children. Not only have orders for these dolls been received from the committee itself, but also from various branches of the Y. M. C. A. and other organizations. A number of individuals have also purchased dolls as part of the movement."

BELT BUSINESS PROMISING.

Jobbers Already Placing Good Orders for the New Season.

Manufacturers of women's belts are going to have an excellent Spring season if early indications can be relied on. Already orders are being received in good volume from jobbers and cutters-up.

The Fall season started rather late, and the coming of the holidays combined with the late start to limit the period for selling belts to about two months. On the whole, however, the business done in that period was satisfactory to the manufacturers.

The coming of the holidays usually means an interruption in this trade, as the retailers push belts aside in favor of other small merchandise meant especially for Christmas. This year, for the first time, certain representative department stores have left women's belts on display.

In the wholesale market preparations are being made for a belt business this Spring that is expected to be larger than that done in any recent year. This expectation is based on the fact that jobbers, especially in the Middle West, are already placing good orders. Wholesalers were slow to buy belts during the Fall because many of them were carrying over merchandise that failed to move last Spring. The leftovers are largely disposed of now, and according to a statement from the United Women's Wear League of America the jobbers are showing a tendency to buy in larger quantities.

The cutting-up trades also are placing orders for belts, and these, while small individually, are numerous enough to move a fair volume of the merchandise. At present, however, it is mostly a matter of sampling with those manufacturers who specialize in belts for the cutters-up, for the dress and coat manufacturers have not yet fully entered their Spring season.

SKILL IN SPECIALIZING.

Lack of It a Handicap to Manufacturer of General Lines.

Successful specialization by one or several manufacturers in the production of certain merchandise does not imply that a manufacturer making general lines can jump in and achieve like success. This comment was made yesterday in connection with reports that the good demand enjoyed by certain firms turning out a staple type of men's serge suits was attracting manufacturers who would try to take advantage of it.

The manufacturer of general lines who thinks that he can invade a market for a specialty at short notice forgets the standardization, production experience and low output costs that the specializing manufacturer has achieved, it was pointed out. To gain these benefits would be impossible for the manufacturer of general lines, unless he decided to become a real specialist in the product, which would take considerable time. Moreover, the field is apt to lose its attractiveness when too many specialize in it. The demand tends generally to be concentrated with a few houses, and the newcomers find the going far too competitive, particularly if they also are handling general lines.

To Display American Rugs.

Domestic manufacturers of rugs and other floor coverings are making plans to hold an exposition of their products at the Waldorf-Astoria here during the week of Jan. 31. The purpose of the exposition is to show the public, as well as trade buyers, the great progress that has been made in American merchandise of this nature during the last twenty years. Some of the leading department stores of Chicago, Pittsburgh, Detroit and other cities are said to be planning cooperation with the sponsors of the project by arranging special displays of various lines of carpets, rugs, linoleums, &c., during the week the exposition is being held. A number of retail buyers from cities all over the country is expected to be here while it is in progress.

Dress Linens Fairly Active.

Dress linens are reported fairly active, particularly in plain colors. Differences of opinion, however, exists as to the actual volume of new business at this time. Linen shirtings are also characterized as fairly active, according to the current market letter of the National Wholesale Dry Goods Association. The better qualities, the letter adds, are apparently receiving a rather notable preference in current buying. Handerchief linens continue active, and there is talk of the possibility of higher prices in the near future.

FINDS SKYSCRAPERS BLOT ON CITY BEAUTY

Curran Says New 'Paper Box' Type Rears an Ugly Head to Mar the Skyline.

NO 'MUNICIPAL ART' HERE

Bassett, Head of Zoning Committee, Regrets That 10-Story Limit Was Not Continued.

The ten-story building limit established in New York City forty years ago would have proved a boon to the metropolis if it had been continued in effect, according to Edward M. Bassett, Chairman of the Mayor's Zoning Committee, who was one of several speakers who advocated decentralization of skyscrapers yesterday at a luncheon of the Municipal Art Society at the Hotel Biltmore. Mr. Bassett spoke of the necessity for revising the zoning laws and said that revision would spread out the business sections of New York.

If the ten-story limit had been continued, said Mr. Bassett, the streets and buildings would have been lighter, new business centres would have arisen and there would have been distribution instead of concentration, with its resultant congestion.

Mr. Bassett did not deny that American architects and builders had created buildings of greater individuality than in Europe and South America, where types of buildings are fixed by legislative act, and no architect may deviate from the hard and fast rules.

Major Henry H. Curran, counsel to the City Club of New York, who recently blamed skyscrapers for traffic congestion, attacked the skyscraper problem from a new angle, and asserted that the new "paper box" type of skyscraper was blotting out the more ornate skyscraper which had created New York City's beautiful skyline.

"I find it hard to talk about municipal art in New York," he said, "because, practically speaking, there isn't any. We have individual objects of art, a great many indoors and a few outdoors, but I know of no more than two or three objects of art in New York that may be called municipal.

"Nature gives us the heavens, the hills and the waters. France gives us the Statue of Liberty. We built our beautiful City Hall ourselves, and so we did with Brooklyn Bridge and with the templed towers that rise so magically from the foot of Manhattan Island, as one sees them, coming up the Bay. Then we did more. We smothered the approaches to the Brooklyn Bridge with great ugly sheds. We waited a hundred years and then we spoiled the City Hall by placing in front of it a pudgy statue, surmounted by a face studiously devoid of character, flanked by a toy sword of 2,000 years, and standing on the necks of two mermaids, who are nevertheless innocent until they are proved guilty. I refer to the statue of 'Civic Virtue,' otherwise known as 'The Rough Guy.'

"But we did more than that. We started a civic centre in the bottom of an old pond, two backyards removed from the back of the City Hall, with the great gray masses of the Municipal Building and the Hall of Records forming a palisade between the City Hall and the new Courthouse in the bottom of the pond. As a civic centre, this is the joke of the century!

"A first glimpse, from the steamship deck, of the towers of the Battery is still a beautiful thing," but the moment the ship noses up past Wall Street, the view of our skyscrapers changes to a long row of upended, right-angled packing boxes that look like a set of dinosaur's teeth with a few missing. On top of each tooth rests a squat-legged water tank, sacred to the cause of American municipal art. Our scattered towers are lost amid the jungle of their surrounding packing-box neighbors. The pristine beauty of the Singer Tower has disappeared. The wonderful Woolworth Tower now has a neighbor thrusting its pill-box top up in the air just across Barclay Street. The Metropolitan Tower is safe so far, but how long will it last in its beautiful aloofness?"

Grosvenor Atterbury, architect, speaking on "The City and The Home," said:

"One half of the population of the United States lives in less than one-eight-hundredth of its area. We have wrought miracles in construction—but they are Frankensteins we cannot control. We have gone Mahomet one better and brought the mountain (in the form of high buildings) to us. And now that we have them in our streets we don't know what to do with them.

"The only real reason for the existence of a city is the welfare of the men, women and children who dwell and work in it. In building the city, we have forgotten the man."

Richard Howland Hunt, President of the Municipal Art Society, presided.

WOULD TAX SKYSCRAPER ON BASIS OF HEIGHT

A new angle in the controversy about the skyscraper was offered by M. W. Weir, architect, of Charles W. Leavitt & Sons, Inc., 285 Madison Avenue, who suggested yesterday that buildings be taxed according to their height above four stories.

The tax on a twenty-story building, according to Mr. Weir's "three-dimensional" tax method, should be based on the assessed value of the horizontal measurement of the land multiplied by five, and not on "the ancient subconscious limit of height" of four stories, as at present. Mr. Weir explained that by this method owners of skyscrapers, instead of the public, would have to pay for more sewers, larger water supply, increased transit lines and other expenses entailed by the construction of tall buildings.

"It is still a fact," he said, "that the average building height in Manhattan is under five stories, and if the tall buildings were taken out of the average, it would probably be about four stories.

"In making our tax laws in the early days, which remain unchanged in the respect of horizontal taxation of land, there was no problem of a third dimension, because the abilities of builders were limited to four stories, and the four stories of the buildings were all that were necessary or economically possible because there were no elevators. The common usage of land for buildings placed the limit of the third dimension to four stories.

"But now comes a new era of things and buildings, and the third dimension becomes a factor affecting all of the public utilities, ancient and modern.

"The alarming and truly dangerous features of this building of tall buildings is that it does not occur in new sections of the city, where such construction may have been provided for, but in the older districts where it is financially and physically impossible to provide adequately for them in matters of open space, street width and transit facilities, and moveover where it is a severe financial burden to provide sewers, water and fire protection.

"To carry the people to and from tall buildings, subways alone have cost New York City $493,000,000, while assessed valuations of the entire city increased but five billions."

LATEST DEALINGS IN REALTY

10TH AV. SITE SOLD TO R. C. WILLIAMS CO.

Wholesale Grocers Acquire the Block Front From 25th to 26th Streets.

PLAN 10-STORY BUILDING

Spring Street Corner Resold to an Investor—Schulte Company Sells Garage.

As a site for a ten-story building the whole block front on the west side of Tenth Avenue, from Twenty-fifth to Twenty-sixth Street, was sold yesterday to R. C. Williams & Co., Inc., wholesale grocers. The seller of the site was the Rayo Building Company, Inc.

The property is known as 259 to 273 Tenth Avenue, 501 to 505 West Twenty-fifth Street and 502 West Twenty-sixth Street, a plot with a frontage of 400 feet, covering an area of approximately 20,000 square feet. The proposed building will contain 200,000 square feet or floor space, and will be used by R. C. Williams & Co., Inc., for its own occupancy.

The company has been in business since 1811, and is now located on Hudson, Thomas and Worth Streets, where they have been for the past thirty-eight years. Brown, Wheelock: Harris, Vought & Co. were the brokers in the sale, Cyrille Carreau, Inc., acting for the sellers.

The site was selected on account of the proposed removal of the New York Central Railroad tracks now on Tenth Avenue and the substituting of an elevated electrified freight line on a private right of way owned by the railroad immediately adjoining the parcel just sold.

J. Arthur Fischer has resold for S. May, E. E., to an investing client the three buildings on a plot 20 by 75 feet, forming the southwest corner or Renwick and Spring Streets, known as 306 Spring Street and 44 and 46 Renwick Street.

Oscar Quinto sold 100 Canal Street, 50 feet east of Christie Street, a five-story building, 50 by 100 feet, to Kaplan & Derow. The store is now occupied by the purchasers, who contemplate making extensive alterations for their own occupancy.

The Schulte Real Estate Company, Inc., sold the garage at 168-172 East Eighty-third Street, 71 by 102 feet, through Cyrille Carreau, Inc., as brokers. The property was held at $140,000.

J. P. and L. A. Kissling, in conjunction with Theodore Ortman, sold the five-story ten-family apartment at 302 West 119th Street to Jennie Foley.

Brett & Wyckoff have sold for Mrs. Clarice Josephy to Adolph & Aaron Weiss the four-story and basement dwelling, size 19 by 102 feet, at 315 West Seventy-seventh Street.

COMMERCIAL LEASES.

Resnick Brothers Take a Floor at 906 Broadway.

Spear & Co., Inc., leased the eighth floor at 906 Broadway, containing 16,000 square feet, to Resnick Bros., ladies' handbags; the seventh floor at 12 East Seventeenth Street to Marks & Federicci, men's clothing, and in conjunction with Stephen H. Tyng & Co. the seventh floor at 5 East Seventeenth Street, running through to 6 East Eighteenth Street to Safran, hand made lamp shades.

Myer Cohen & Sons, Inc., rented three stores in the Herogel Building, in course of construction at 315-25 West Street, to Morris Blum, stationery and printing; to Morris Janover, electrical supplies and machinists, and to I. B. Silk Co., silks. All these leases were for a long term of years.

Douglas L. Elliman & Co. leased to Ascher Levin, Inc., for a linen and lingerie shop a store in the new Berkshire Hotel building at 500 Madison Avenue.

The Duross Company leased for the Adart Realty Corporation through Adams & Co., agents, the third floor containing 6,000 square feet at 12 East Twelfth Street to W. F. Smith for the manufacture of men's and boys' neckwear.

The Broderick & Bascom Rope Company of St. Louis have leased the ground floor in the new Ruwe building at 68-72 Washington Street. This company has been located at 76 Warren Street for many years. Caven & Galbreath, Inc., negotiated the lease.

TRADING IN BROOKLYN.

Investor Buys Eight-Family Flat on Brooklyn Avenue.

In the Nostrand Avenue section Bulkley & Horton Company sold the eight-family brick apartment house, on a plot 36 by 100 feet, at 166 Brooklyn Avenue, between St. Marks and Prospect, for H. C. Delefield to a buyer for investment.

Friday & Lehmann sold 24 Pilling Street, a two-story fram two-family dwelling on lot 20 by 100 feet, for Margaret E. Hellstern to a client for occupancy, and 270 Crescent Street, a two-family brick dwelling on lot 20 by 100 feet, for Fred C. Hunter to client for occupancy.

Coughlan Sale in Brooklyn.

Next Tuesday evening, at 7:30, in the Brooklyn Real Estate Exchange, 189 Montague Street, Coughlan & Co., Inc., auctioneers, will hold a sale of improved and unimproved properties in Brooklyn, Jamaica, Richmond Hill, Long Island. Included in this sale are four one-family frame dwellings at 130-12, 130-14, 130-16, 130-20 114th Place, Richmond Hill, and ten one-family frame dwellings at 119-29 to 119-45 146th Street and 146-01 and 146-03 120th Avenue, and six one-family frame and stucco dwellings on 116th Road, between 142d and 143d Streets, South Jamaica, L. I., all of which will be sold at an absolute auction. Also included in this sale are three four-story brick front tenements and one four-story and one six-story rear tenements known as 55, 57 and 59 South Second Street, between Wythe and Kent Avenues, in the Williamsburg section of Brooklyn.

Woman Broker in Two Deals.

A. J. Hammerslaugh sold the three properties at 405, 407 and 409 Bleecker Street to Emanued Bach for investment through a broker. The same broker sold to F. K. Maximilian the three-story and basement house at 7 St. Lukes Place, for C. La Forgia.

Bronx Taxpayer in Sale.

The W. H. B. Realty Corporation sold through Harold M. Silverman to a client of Max Weinstein the one-story taxpayer on the south side of East 170th Street, between Morris and Grant Avenues, containing twenty-one stores, renting for $34,000.

Chemical National Leases Space for a 5th Av. Branch

More than half of the ground floor of the new professional building in course of construction for the Midi Realty Corporation, C. F. Nordstrum, President, at 685 Fifth Avenue and 2 East Fifty-fourth Street, southeast corner, has been leased to the Chemical National Bank. The bank expects to open a new branch at this location about April 1.

The building, which will be sixteen stories, is being built from plans of Sloan & Robertson by Max Greenberg, builder, and is on the site occupied until recently by the residence of Samuel Untermyer. Mr. Untermyer leased this property last Summer to the Midi Realty Corporation for sixty-three years, and the lessees are erecting a building especially constructed, equipped and serviced to meet the requirements of specialists in surgery, medicine and dentistry.

The Chemical National Bank now has operating two other uptown offices, one at Fifth Avenue and Twenty-ninth Street and the other at Madison Avenue and Forty-sixth Street.

STRONG BUYERS LEAD THE BROOKLYN MARKET

Deals Are Being Made by Interests With Good Financial Backing, Says J. F. James.

More careful selection of properties by the buying market, with stress laid upon location and development possibilities, is the latest trend in the early Winter real estate activities of Brooklyn, according to the semi-monthly report of the directors of the Kings County Real Estate Corporation.

"Well-located properties and buildings, capable of up-to-date development, are finding willing buyers," is the consensus announced through John F. James, President of the corporation.

Haphazard buying for anticipated speculative turn-over is strikingly absent in both the business and home buying field, it is declared by Mr. James. A survey of real estate transactions throughout the borough during the past month has shown the investment field dominated by strongly financed operators, builders and brokerage organizations, whose announced plans call for further developments of these holdings, the corporation's report shows.

Barring of the speculative element in the Brooklyn field is seen by Mr. James as one of the most promising factors toward maintaining a stable market. "Responsible interests, backed by strong financial assets, are in control of the Brooklyn real estate market," he said, "and there can be no danger of serious breaks in the future market based upon the sound conditions of the present-day activities."

SEE FLATBUSH FUTURE.

Growth of Residential Section Influences Leverich Deal.

Purchase of the five-story apartment located at 650 East Twenty-first Street and Newkirk Avenue, Brooklyn, was announced last week by the Leverich Realty Corporation, who value this new holding at $165,000. The building, situated in a residential section of Flatbush, has been named Leverich Arms, replacing the original Leverich Arms, at Sydney Place, Brooklyn, which was sold by the corporation.

The new Leverich Arms will be held under the management and exclusive ownership of the corporation, according to Herman M. Schlesinger, manager, real estate department, who represented the purchasers. "The Leverich Corporation was greatly influenced by the striking growth of Flatbush Avenue within two blocks of the apartment site in acquiring this property," said Mr. Schlesinger. "Not only is the neighborhood one of the most highly developed residential communities of the borough, but the Flatbush Avenue area near by also is gaining importance as one of the most favored highly restricted apartment areas.

"Highly developed as it is, we believe this part of Flatbush is destined to become even more attractive as an apartment centre. Municipal and transit facilities are unexcelled and development has been of the highest type of modern buildings, ranking it as a leading apartment-house centre.

"It is such well-built sections that are bringing the most attention from incoming residents, records of our office show," Mr. Schlesinger said. "Former residents of high-rent areas are finding that their moderate means suffice to afford attractive living quarters in just such sections of Brooklyn."

Prudential Lends $20,000,000.

Continuing its policy of investing in real estate mortgage loans, the Prudential Insurance Company of America during November made loans amounting to $20,491,077. This record was disclosed in a statement made yesterday by Archibald M. Woodruff, Vice President in charge of that phase of the Prudential's activity. Of this total $16,780,918 was represented by loans made on 2,875 dwellings and 141 apartments in the United States and Canada. These will accommodate 4,573 families. There were loans on city properties other than dwellings and apartments to the amount of $1,388,150, and the remaining $2,322,008 was represented by investments in farm mortgages.

To Discuss the Skyscraper.

Harvey W. Corbett will speak on "The Skyscraper, Particularly in Its Relation to the Proposed Zoning Regulations," at a luncheon meeting of the Real Estate Club of the Federation for the Support of Jewish Philanthropic Societies on Tuesday, Dec. 14, at 12:45 P. M. at the Hotel Biltmore. G. Richard Davis, President of the club, will preside.

Mrs. Kibbe Buys Cooperative.

Culver Associates, Inc. sold another apartment for Paterno Brothers in the new 100 per cent. cooperative apartment which is now being erected at 825 Fifth Avenue. The purchaser is Mrs. Harry U. Kibbe, who is President of the Bide-a-Wee Home for Animals. Brown, Wheelock: Harris, Vought & Co., Inc., represented Paterno Brothers.

Registry of Owner's Name.

Every owner of an apartment house, or tenement, and every lessee of the whole house, must file in the Tenement House Department his name, address and change of address, and description of the property. Penalty of $50 for noncompliance. This applies to all apartment houses and tenements recorded in the Tenement House Department.

HOMESEEKERS BUY IN WESTCHESTER

Several Private Residences in Suburban Towns Are Taken for Early Occupancy.

DEALS ON LONG ISLAND

Harry Levey Purchases 400-Acre Tract Near Lindenhurst—Transactions in Queens.

There was considerable activity in the suburban market yesterday, with interest centring around Westchester properties. Brokers who operate extensively in this section reported a number of small homes sold to clients for occupancy.

Peter Alvino sold his Italian villa, on a plot of about 300 by 350 feet, fronting on Winyah Avenue, near Webster Avenue, New Rochelle. The purchaser is Gaetano Clemente of the Clemente Contracting Company, who will occupy after extensive alterations have been completed. G. Tuoti & Co. were the brokers.

Mrs. Annie Holmes purchased a six-room stone house at Pine Cliff Road and Spring Lane, Chappaqua, N. Y., from Horace M. Masters through O. J. Kise as broker.

Miss Esther Miesels purchased a five-room stone bungalow on Spring Lane, Chappaqua, from Horace M. Masters through the same broker.

The Joseph E. Merriam Organization sold for Horace G. Arnold his residence on St. Mark's Place, Mount Kisco, to a Manhattan buyer.

Harry Levy has purchased a tract of more than 400 acres in Lindenhurst and Babylon, which he plans to subdivide into 6,100 lots for the Spring market. Mr. Levy predicted that 1927 would establish a record year for Long Island real estate.

Helena Rubinstein, Inc., manufacturers of beauty preparations and cosmetics, have purchased through Cross & Brown Company the two-story fireproof building, 100 by 125, on the west side of First Avenue, between Freeman and Beebe Avenues, Long Island City, and will immediately use the entire building for their own use.

The same brokers, in conjunction with Irving Berger, have sold for the Landgrove Realty Corporation the southwest corner of Roosevelt Avenue and Lee Avenue, Winfield. The purchasers will immediately improve with stores and apartments.

The Cross & Brown Company also leased, for Ernest Sexauer to the Mileage Gas Corporation, the plot 80 by 375, on the northwest corner of Queens Boulevard and Harold Avenue, Long Island City, for a term of twenty-one years.

The Robert Dasey Associates of Flushing have sold the three new three-story brick store and apartment buildings on Twenty-second Street, adjoining the corner of Sanford Avenue, Flushing. The purchaser is Irving Reisenburger, Vice President of the Queensboro National Bank of Corona, and the seller is the MacRobben Realty Company. Mr. Reisenburger purchased the property as an investment.

Frank S. O'Hara sold for Ernest Haberle a one-family dwelling on the east side of Twenty-second Street, 126 feet north of Jackson Avenue, to Albert Golden. The same broker also sold for the Este Development Corporation to a Jackson Heights investor two business lots on the south side of Vandeventer Avenue, east of Eighteenth Avenue, Astoria.

The Robert E. Farley Organization has sold to Catherine Sherlock for the Scarsdale Estates its house at 31 Wyanoke Street, White Plains. Mrs. Sherlock will occupy the property as her home. The Farley Organization has sold to the same buyer a plot on Farley Road, Greenacres, Scarsdale, on which the purchaser is now starting the erection of a house, and two large plots on Gorham Court adjoining the newly opened section of Brewster Road, Greenacres, which plots the purchaser will improve.

NEW ED. PINAUD BUILDING.

Cornerstone of the Structure to Be Sealed Tuesday.

The new building for Ed. Pinaud at 220 East Twenty-first Street will be formally opened with appropriate ceremonies on Tuesday next.

The seven-story structure of steel and concrete faced with tapestry brick and terra cotta was especially designed for the firm's laboratories and general offices and represents the full development of special study in the handling of their products.

The American concern was founded in 1878 and is still managed by a family that has in unbroken line maintained the Ed. Pinaud factories since 1798. The President, Georges Klotz, on Tuesday, will formally seal in the cornerstone of the complete structure samples of present day products.

The building was begun in 1926 from plans by Buchman & Kahn.

BRONX BOROUGH SALES.

Garage and Vacant Plots in Change of Ownership.

The Edis Garage Inc., sold the southeast corner of Inwood Avenue and Goble Place, 130 by 100 feet. This is a one-story garage. The broker was John J. Reynolds.

Rullman Brothers, Inc., sold for Charles T. Deering the vacant plot, 50 by 115 feet, on the west side of Nelson Avenue, 50 feet south of 170th Street.

A plot, 50 by 100 feet, on Matthews Avenue, near Pelham Parkway, was sold by James Rogers to S. Cometh, who intends to improve with a two-family brick dwelling. Connaughton & Stanton were the brokers.

$300,000 Broadway Loan Placed.

Jacob and Emil Leitner have recently negotiated for the Broadway and 173d Street Corporation, Gordon Wolkenberg, President, a first mortgage of $300,000 on the six-story elevator apartment house on the southwest corner of Broadway and 173d Street.

Hamilton Grange Is Active.

The Hamilton Grange Association, Inc., through its President, Charles S. Sinsheimer, has started an active campaign to keep up the standards of ownership in the neighborhood that it covers. According to Mr. Sinsheimer, the association has already been instrumental in avoiding undesirable encroachments on Hamilton Terrace, preserving for this street its strict residential character.

Manhattan Plans Filed.

Krimholz Brothers, Inc., as owners of record, yesterday filed plans for a fifteen-story apartment house to be erected at 143 to 149 West Ninety-sixth Street at a cost of $900,000. The building will occupy a plot 85 by 80.11 feet and will be erected from plans by Gronenberg & Leuchtag, architects.

NO other writer, living or dead, has ever pictured life with the fearless audacity and daring devotion to truth of Guy de Maupassant. In stories that may be read in ten minutes, Maupassant, with his characteristic pagan frankness, embodies the entire gamut of human passions, the full breadth and depth of French life and love.

Now for the first time you can know and enjoy all the superb short stories of Maupassant, many of them never before published in English, except in rare editions long out of print! Every translation absolutely complete, authentic and unabridged.

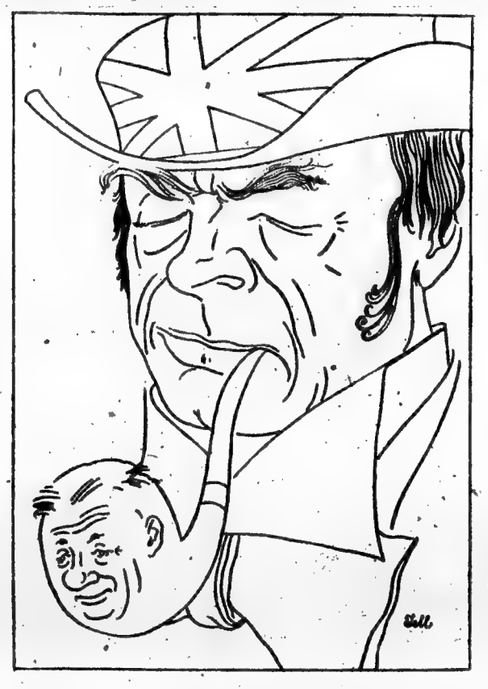
Mr. Gardiner's Portraits Range From Lenglen to Calvin Coolidge

Dean Inge.



A Premier and John Bull.

Suzanne Lenglen.

These Illustrations Are From Caricatures by Tell for "A Rude Book." (Edwin Valentine Mitchell.)

PORTRAITS AND PORTENTS. By A. G. Gardiner. Illustrated. 206 pp. New York: Harper & Brothers. $3.

By P. W. WILSON

THE price of a portrait, whether by brush or by pen, is determined by two factors: first, the value of the person depicted, and, secondly, the value of the art in the picture. An unknown man becomes immortal when painted by da Vinci. And an unknown painter is cherished forever if his subject be Alexander the Great, in a Lely or a Lawrence fashion assists fame and fame assists fashion.

To qualify for what has become the unique gallery of miniatures by Mr. Gardiner you must be already among the known, a person of whom the public wishes to hear more. In his boat there are no passengers; every captive has to pull his weight; even Lady Astor is chained to the oar. Yet there is compensation. A character sketch, with or without the quality of mercy, is twice blessed. It helps Mr. Amery to be vivisected by Mr. Gardiner. And it helps Mr. Gardiner thus to vivisect Mr. Amery.

Mr. Gardiner's books are thus of a deserved interest to his contemporaries, and they include a good deal which will be essential to the historian. In the future people will turn to these pages as today they turn to Pepys and Greville, and find fascination in what we are too apt to take for granted.

Mr. Gardiner seldom fails to deliver the goods. In his writing there is usually a substantial matter, much of it the result of observation or special inquiry, and if the wrapping of the parcel is at times rough, if there is a certain indifference to the final polish which is usually an essential to the most lasting prose, it will be remembered that these estimates, promoted to be literature, originated as journalism. They were written to the tick of the clock. Indeed, what the critic condemns as redundancy is actually a virtue in a contribution to the press. Newspapers appeal to a jury which does not always "get you" the first time. The point must be hammered home. And Mr. Gardiner hits the nail on the head, also hitting hard.

In the main it is, then, a pre-existent notoriety that Mr. Gardiner focuses on his subject. His style may be defined as daylight concentrated into spotlight—the obvious intensified into drama. Never was President Coolidge so silent, never was Dean Inge so gloomy, never was Lord Grey so disappointed, Mussolini so theatrical or Ramsay MacDonald so moody. Each person must incarnate an idea. Bernard Shaw, for instance, is seen to have been canonized as a saint, and Arnold Bennett to be engaged in perpetual war against the humility of his second name, Enoch. In these sketches there is little biography and no evolution of the individuality. Some one is told to strike an attitude, to look this way, and snap goes the shutter of the camera. He may repent. He may backslide. He may rise. He may fall. But there, for all time, is his picture, a predestination in print.

At his best Mr. Gardiner is comparative. Is Miss Sybil Thorndike as great an actress as Duse? And how are we to measure the cricket of Hobbs against the cricket of Grace and Ranjitsinhji? His use of words is here exquisite. Devotees of the diamond plate themselves will appreciate this:

> In the hands of Ranjitsinhji the bat was a magician's wand. It seemed to whisper its secret to the ball and send it flying on its errand with a touch, a flick, a glide that was almost impalpable as a breath of wind.

Faced by radio, the movies and the consolidation of newspapers in Britain, Mr. Gardiner is impressed and at times obsessed by the stupendous phenomenon of publicity in the twentieth century. He sees the fate which controls his puppets as an Oriental potentate who, for no accountable reason, picks out, here a Coolidge from his farm, there a Baldwin from his factory, and again a Hindenburg from his restaurant, and sets him on the very pinnacle of civilization. Like producing rabbits from a hat or ladies from a steamer trunk, it is a conjuring trick in which there is no obvious cause to explain the effect. As he suggests, there are great open spaces, on newspaper and screen, a territory as valuable as any province for which nations have fought, which has yet been conquered by men and women, never born to be monarchs of any realm, who reign supreme by chance divine. And to their empire there is no frontier. Voice and sight are universal.

Faced by such a situation, Mr. Gardiner summons emphasis to reinforce strict veracity. Not enough for him that Suzanne Lenglen is the Bernhardt of tennis. She must be nothing less than the most celebrated woman in the world, contrasted with whose fairy feet all others are, despite the evidence of the slow-moving camera, as lead. It is not enough that "Margot" can coin a telling epigram. She must be, despite all memories of Lady Hester Stanhope and Lady Palmerston, the most brilliant woman who ever presided over Downing Street. Nor is it enough that Charlie Chaplin should have been the founder of fun on the film. Despite Buster Keaton and Harold Lloyd, he must still stand "alone" in his glory—the sole person on this planet who has ever been more celebrated than Suzanne Lenglen. Each star in turn becomes a sun which renders all others invisible. And Mr. Gardiner does not hesitate to inform us that Dean Inge has obliterated the bench of bishops.

If publicity be the standard of significance, he may be right. The man of the moment does, for the moment, shut out the men who are greater than the moment. No candle has ever been as bright as flashlight, but when the flashlight is over, the candle still burns. Mr. Maynard Keynes was wonderful over reparations. It was a dazzling stunt. But it was a stunt disastrous to the causes which Mr. Gardiner himself has at heart. He wants the United States in the League of Nations. It was Mr. Keynes who, at the critical moment, applied the sabotage. Mr. Gardiner also wants a Liberal Party. Mr. Keynes has announced that his test for a Liberal is birth control. Doubtless Mr. Keynes has wisdom, but it is a wisdom that is not to be justified of her children.

Some artists paint alone for truth and beauty. For instance, Reynolds was as appreciative of a satin dress, whether the lady were Whig or Tory. Other artists, as great as he, played politics, and Mr. Gardiner, like Dante and Michael Angelo, is not quite happy unless a percentage of his Popes are in hell. The punishment is eternal, and Lloyd George, consigned to the nether regions in previous volumes, is here prodded from time to time with the pitchfork to indicate that he is still on the roast. Happily, he is now joined by his friends. Lords Birkenhead, Beaverbrook and Rothermere, with Ramsay MacDonald and John Wheatley, share the dreadful edict of Mr. Gardiner's disapproval. Indeed, even J. H. Thomas is warned that he has Welsh blood in his veins. He must be careful.

There arises, then, the question, What is the sin for which pardon is so remote? We take it that, in Mr. Gardiner's opinion, the evil is, first, a popular press that knows no principle, and, secondly, the popular politician who truckles to that press. Presumably, all these illustrious impenitents would prefer perdition with publicity to oblivion in paradise. Yet we are bound to ask, if sensation be iniquity, what else is Mr. Gardiner's own gospel? The only reason why he likes Dean Inge better than he likes the bishops is that Dean Inge creates a sensation, while the bishops are merely Christians. It matters nothing to him whether Lady Oxford embarrasses the Liberty Party and travels about the United States as long as she creates a sensation. Mr. Ford is the most extraordinary man in the world because he has created a sensation. Yet what have the Beaverbrooks and the Rothermere's done unless it be to exploit this craving for sensation?

There are men who have had the courage to resist this trend of the times. Mr. Gardiner is genuine in his admiration of them. And he mentions four—President Coolidge, General Hindenburg, Stanley Baldwin and "Tim" Healy—all of them, by the way, at the head of a State.

But, in the case of all of them, Mr. Gardiner does not conceal his opinion that an education has been sadly restricted. Mr. Coolidge has a face that "bears the impress of that bleak philosophy with which Calvinism took the creases of laughter out of the human countenance. Hindenburg's "opinions are medieval and his intellect, outside war, negligible." And Healy is "a frank obscurantist, a fourteenth-century monk born out of due time." Baldwin is merely "bucolic."

By EDWIN CLARK

As every one knows, the meditative essay is out of joint with the times. There is no time nowadays for meditation—he who meditates is lost in the shuffle—in this age of fast and clear-cut thinking. But the happiness boys and girls listed above have at least made us thoughtful, for humor can be a terribly serious thing, especially in large doses. All meditation having been run down by parti-colored taxis, what of the continuity of letters, of which the critics speak? Where are the essayists of yesteryear? We insist that those who formally wrote essays beginning with Oh, have their followers with slight adaptations even in the Jazz Age.

It is just a surface change, a matter of no longer wearing their hearts on their sleeves. We have discovered that the essayists of today have taken refuge in the old adage that many a truth can be spoken in jest. So we are going to suggest—with timidity of course—that Mr. Sullivan of the zany wit and Mr. Chappell might have in a more leisurely period, a less demanding one, have been writing of "Roast Pig," "Popular Fallacies," "Witches and Other Night Fears" and "Poor Relations." Mrs. Seabury, too, doubtless has some blue stocking connection. Certainly, Lady Mary Wortley Montagu, Mary Shelley or Mrs. Thrale shunting the forbidding Dr. Johnson from her door, never had any lower opinion of the newly discovered sheltered sex than Mrs. Seabury.

In bygone days, Thackeray called the amusing commentators of current events, lay preachers. Surprising as this may be, it can be liberally construed. We would do nothing to discourage these engaging fellows—and Mrs. Seabury, too—who appear so cheerful before us after a bleak Autumn with the new novels. These are humorists for humor's sake. Even if Mrs. Seabury has an axe to grind, she can whistle as she works. What, too, would the news of the day be without the adventures of Martha Hepplethwaite?

Mr. Sullivan can scramble history in the best of fantastic style; he can turn a sentence of old into a new comic twist of the unexpected; but his great virtue is in his character creation, which hint—yes, hint suggestively, Mr. Sullivan, that you can go much further than these sketches. Only promise us, Mr. Sullivan, that youth never venture into the bleak Middle or Northwest. Anyway, may we ask why Aunt Sarah Gallop has eluded this book? What about these two grand dames meeting? How has Aunt Sarah eluded the adventurous Martha? Perhaps these questions are indelicate and we're intruding on what is to be a later book.

Then there is Don Herold and his pensive insistence that "there ought to be a law." But not, we hope, against his reporting that "More laws will do no good." We already have so many laws that it is difficult to decide what kind of liquor to drink and who to rob next." He writes from a comic slant about doctors, babies, baby clothes, laundry, garden seeds, vaudeville, Bohemia, thrift, bathing, can openers and even ancestors, though of the latter he speaks slightingly. There seems to be evidence in his domestic discussions of the fruits of meditation delivered in a flip, modern way.

"The Delicatessen Husband and Other Essays," by Florence Guy Seabury, convinces one that she is the direct descendant of all the literary blue stockings. The things this women in this happy suburb were she can call them! Such ingratitude, too, after all that men have done for this world in discovering it and making it a better place to live in. Mrs. Seabury is a rampant, yet humorous feminist. How she can argue and swing the slap-stick about at the same time! Nor is she satisfied with removing the halos from numerous types of male heroes; she must set up some straw dummies, which she gayly attacks, laughing them hilariously out of court.

Unsuspectingly, one laughs his way through "The Younger Married Set" without an inkling that the women in this happy suburg were being cheated of their natural desires. In the account of the Governor's ball, which every one had decided was to be respectable and close early, only to have the Hoofner, Brigham and Tuttle supper parties arrive at the prearranged hour of closing and start the ball rolling with a bang, there is hearty amusement. That is because Mr. Chappell has never heard of the sheltered sex. For if he only knew as much as Mrs. Seabury, in this suburb of his there are men who would rather have been home knitting than to have gone jazzing about. And if the ladies only shared the same knowledge, they need not have stayed at home, having bridge clubs and literary clubs, but could have gone out into the world and expressed themselves. Unfortunately, they didn't know that their poor, tired husbands, who did nothing but work all day and play around with them at night, were the sheltered sex. We are glad, too, that we read Mr. Chappell first, before we were disillusioned. We had so much fun and it might have been all spoiled, thinking of what these ladies were missing by their ignorance of the advancing woman.

We may have been misleading about Mrs. Seabury, for she is concerned with the wrongs of men, poor dears, as well as those of the ladies. Of course, it all starts with the silly pretext of men masquerading under the banner of chivalry. That's all wrong. They are the protected sex. The women folks keep away from them any of the disturbing elements of reality. Really, it's amazing how this is accomplished. But Mrs. Seabury is artful; she can contrive a mountain out of a molehill with the utmost ease; and everything is grist that comes to her mill; for she supports her thesis with varied evidence gathered fore and aft. Following her assertions and expositions of them has the best cross word puzzle lashed to the mast for sheer pleasure. Men, for instance, are biologically inferior to women because they can't bear children. Therefore, they gloss over this inferiority by the compensation of conceiving a male god. After staggering the reader with this observation, Mrs. Seabury blithely runs through a series of incidents, in which the women enters the world of activity and the man stays at home, or serves as her assistant. Now the point of all this isn't that it's an exception, but that it is the coming thing. We are going to have an adjustment, from now on, and the suppressed women, hitherto kept in

"There Will Come a Time When a Nervous Man May Scream Without Losing Caste." From One of the Illustrations by Clarence Day Jr. for "The Delicatessen Husband."

Lewis Carroll Before the "Alice" Books

FURTHER NONSENSE VERSE AND PROSE. By Lewis Carroll. New York: D. Appleton & Co. $2.

THERE is little in this volume of forgotten or hitherto unpublished specimens of the work of Lewis Carroll to suggest the author of the "Alice" books. Many of the selections are skits and verses written during the author's boyhood and young manhood, before his wonderful talent for writing real nonsense verse and prose had reached its full development. These selections exhibit a keen sense of humor, but it is exercised chiefly in parody and burlesque, as in the verses entitled "The Lady of the Ladle," which begin:

The Youth at Eve had drunk his fill,
Where stands the "Royal" on the Hill,
And long his mid-day stroll had made,
On the so-called "Marine Parade."

The maturer Carroll would never have written that limping fourth line. Nowhere in these youthful effusions is there any hint of the author's remarkable faculty for coining absolutely meaningless words which look and sound as though they ought to mean something. In one poem, "A Sea Dirge," we find a stringing together of unrelated words that calls to mind those never-to-be-forgotten lines:

"The time has come," the Walrus said,
"To talk of many things:
Of shoes—and ships—and sealing wax—
And cabbages—and kings."

"A Sea Dirge" begins:

There are certain things—as a spider, a ghost,
The income-tax, gout, an umbrella for three—
That I hate, but the thing that I hate the most
Is a thing they call the Sea.

There is a resemblance, it is true, but it is the resemblance of a tallow-dip to the noonday sun.

A number of the selections in Mr. Reed's book are from letters written by Lewis Carroll to his young friends, and many of these are delightful.

The best example of nonsense verse in the book is a dedication in the form of an acrostic, written by Lewis Carroll on the fly-leaf of a copy of "The Hunting of the Snark," which he sent to Miss Adelaide Paine in 1876:

"Are you deaf, Father William?" the young man said.
"Did you hear what I told you just now?
Excuse me for shouting! Don't waggle your head
Like a blundering, sleepy old cow!
A little maid dwelling in Wallington Town
Is my friend, so I beg to remark
Do you think she'd be pleased if a book were sent down Entitled 'the Hunt of the Snark'?"
"Pack it up in brown paper!" the old man cried,
"And seal it with olive-and-dove
I command you to do it!" he added with pride,
"Nor forget, my good fellow, to send her beside Easter Greetings, and give her my love."

From One of the Drawings by H. M. Bateman, for "Further Nonsense Verse and Prose."

In his Foreword to the volume Mr. Reed gives a brief biography of Lewis Carroll, whose real name, as everybody ought to know, was Charles Lutwidge Dodgson. The pseudonym, we are told, was selected from four submitted, presumably by Dodgson himself, to Edmund Yates, the editor of The Train, a publication to which the young author contributed several poems. "Lewis Carroll" is derived from Dodgson's two Christian names, Lewis coming from Ludovicus, which is sufficiently similar to Lutwige, and Carroll from Carolus, the Latin form of Charles. The first effort to which the new pseudonym was appended was a serious poem, "The Path of Roses," which appeared in The Train in 1856, when the author was 24 years old.

Besides reminding us that Mr. Dodgson was ordained a deacon of the Church of England, but never undertook regular duties as a priest, although he preached occasionally, and that he was a distinguished mathematician and the author of several mathematical works, Mr. Reed informs us that he was an enthusiastic photographer with a genuine flair for artistic photography, and that he took many photographs of his distinguished friends and of the children he loved. We are also told that he invented many ingenious table games and puzzles, and Mr. Reed thinks it extremely probable that he was the real inventor of cross-word puzzles. That may or may not be true, but there can be little doubt that Lewis Carroll would have been glad to have invented anything that has given so much pleasure to so many people.

Sprinkle it with kisses, for confection,
Sweeten with a look of loving eyes.
Flavor it with children's merry chatter,
Frost it with the snow of wintry dells,
Place it on a holly-garnished platter,
And serve it with the song of Christmas bells.

"The Paradoxical Confessions"

HENRY J. BARRYMORE, New York.—I am the author of the story entitled as above for which A. B. R. inquired in your issue of Nov. 7. It appeared in The Forum and as far as I am able to recall it was within the year 1890. The Forum office ought to be able to verify this date.

"Oblivion of a Day"

MISS HELEN G. TAYLOR, New York.—S. H. W. in your issue of Oct. 31 wishes to know the author of the lines

And if I drink oblivion of a day,
So shorten I the stature of my soul, which were written by George Meredith and may be found in Selection 12 of his poem "Modern Love." Miss Louella D. Everett, Boston, Mass., also answered this request.

"Requiescat"

MISS G. S. ORGEL, New York.—The verse, "All her bright golden hair, tarnished with rust, she that was young and fair fallen to rust," for which H. McG. R. asked in your issue of Nov. 14, is taken from Oscar Wilde's "Requiescat." It was written in memory of his younger sister, who died when very young. The poem may be found in any edition of Wilde's "Poems," as well as in Stevenson's "Home Book of Verse," and in the "Oxford Book of Victorian Verse."

Mrs. Donald Whitson, Afton, N. Y.; Whitelaw Saunders, Wamego, Kan.; Miss Dorothy Daffron, Harrisonburg, Va.; Miss Emily Bramhall Bowne, Dedham, Mass.; Miss Ruth Hogan, New York; Miss Sarah M. Searing, Auburn, N. Y., and Miss Louella D. Everett, Boston, Mass., contributed copies of the poem, one of which has been sent to our correspondent. Sebastian Bitter, Plainfield, N. J., and Ellwood Clark, New York, also answered this request.

"A Bag of Tools"

EUGENE L. SCHLOSSBERG, New York.—The quotation E. T. R. asks about in your issue of Nov. 14 is from a poem by R. L. Sharpe as follows:

STUMBLING BLOCK OR STEPPING STONE.

Isn't it strange that Princes and Kings
And clowns that caper in sawdust rings,
And common folks like you and me,
Are Builders for Eternity?

To each is given a bag of tools,
A shapeless mass and a book of rules;
And each must make, ere life is flown,
A stumbling block or a stepping stone.

Miss R. L. Esner, New York, and H. K. Carpenter, Peace Dale, R. I., also sent in the poem. A copy has been forwarded to E. T. R.

"A Simple Ostrich"

WILLIAM DELANEY, Brooklyn, N. Y.—W. H. P., who asks in your issue of Nov. 14, will find the song "The Simple Little Ostrich," made famous by De Wolfe Hopper, in almost any music store. The music was published by the Harms Music Company, 62 West Forty-fifth Street, New York. J. R. Porter, Portsmouth, Va., contributed the poem, a copy of which has been sent to our correspondent. J. W. Barbut, Brooklyn, N. Y., tells us that the song was sung by Francis Wilson in one of his operas. Mrs. Harold E. W. Young, Brooklyn, N. Y., contributed the complete song.

"Me"

HAROLD STEELE, Chesapeake City, Md.—In answer to the request of E. R. in your issue of Nov. 14 for the poem by George Cohan entitled "Myself and Me," it may be found in "Heart Throbs" (Vol. 2), published by the Chappel Publishing Company of Boston. The poem Mr. Steele encloses is too long for publication, but we print the first of the nine stanzas below:

I'm the best pal that I ever had,
I like to be with me;
I like to sit and tell myself
Things confidentially.

Miss Louella D. Everett, Boston, Mass.; Miss Helen G. Hamilton, Readfield, Me.; William H. Alger, Otego, N. Y.; Miss Allie Ulrich, Brooklyn, N. Y.; Miss Regina C. Bohner, Brooklyn, N. Y.; Kenneth Moyer, Ridgway, Pa.; Miss N. P. Hamilton, Jersey City, N. J.; Matt J. Cary, New York; Miss Louise L. Brown, Newark, N. J.; Charlotte W. Norton, Port Washington, L. I.; Mrs. K. Leyeen Brown, Bloomfield, N. J.; Miss Zita H. Connolly, New York, and Marguerite M. Eskind, Nashville, Tenn., also contributed the poem. A copy has been sent to our correspondent.

"Mark Twain's Philosophy"

MISS JANET M. TODD, New York.—In reply to F. I. W. in your issue of Nov. 28 the book describing Mark Twain's philosophy as "solipsism" is entitled, "Through Agnostic Spectacles" and the author's name is Alexander Kadison. My edition is dated 1919.

"Good Fellowship"

H. V. JOHNSON, Washington, D. C.—I enclose the poem "Good Fellowship," by Wilbur D. Nesbit, wanted by M. F. J. in your issue of Nov. 21.

GOOD FELLOWSHIP.

Ho, brother, it's the handclasp and the good word and the smile
That does the most and helps the most to make the world worth while!
It's all of us together, or it's only you and I—
A ringing song of friendship, and the heart beats high;
A ringing song of friendship, and a word or two of cheer,
Then all the world is gladder and the bending sky is clear!
It's you and I together—and we're brothers one and all
Whenever through good fellowship we hear the subtle call,
Whenever in the ruck of things we feel the helping hand
Or see the deeper glow that none but we may understand—
Then all the world is good to us and all is worth the while;
Ho, brother, it's the handclasp and the good word and the smile!

From "The Book of Poems," by Wilbur D. Nesbit. The Bowman Publishing Company, Evanston, Ill., 1906.

"An exciting book . . . She has a barbed wit, this young woman, as neat as an arrow driven through the heart of a target, and as ruthless."
H. B., N. Y. Evening Post

Wilhelm of Doorn Recalls the Days of His Youth

The Former Kaiser's Recollections in "My Early Life" Are for the Most Part Kindly in Spirit

MY EARLY LIFE. By William II, Ex-Emperor of Germany. Translated from the German. 352 pp. New York: The George H. Doran Company. $5.

By POULTNEY BIGELOW

WILLIAM II has written a book recalling his early years and he has done it with rare frankness, brevity and regard for the feelings of others.

A Kaiser is not as other men, especially a real, traditional, paternal, autocratical, dyed-in-the-wool Hohenzollern like William II. This is the first book by an author of this mold—not that other emperors have not sought literary fame, but of them all I recall none that my British friends would class as a genuine, legitimate and completely pukka Kaiser.

Of all the emperors I can recall at this moment, William II is the one par excellence who was bred from babyhood to the exalted position he was destined to fill by the traditions of Prussian monarchy. From the cradle in 1859 to the imperial throne in 1888 it would be hard to select a year or a moment in which William II was not under discipline more severe than any known to an American of my generation. His parents loved him dearly, but their love was of the Spartan kind. This love was cordially reciprocated by their son, and in his memoirs there is no mark of displeasure at the rigorous childhood he was compelled to lead.

It was William II's good fortune to know in his youth only pure women and clean, brave, loyal, highly educated men. His venerable grandfather and also the Empress Augusta had a wholesome influence on the young Prince; and we have interesting mention of their words and ways. Old William I lived more than ninety years, and before the victory of Sedan had twice entered Paris with a victorious Prussian Army. He was a grand old monarch, that first Emperor William—Der Greise Kaiser as his people fondly called him. Nor can I recall without emotion how myself and other boys of my age, whether American or German—how proud we were when privileged merely to see his venerable form when he might be walking in the park. But when we were so fortunate as to catch his eye and have our salutation returned with a smile of ineffable charm, then our joy knew no bounds and we ran home to brag about it.

William II admired and loved both his parents—although evil tongues delighted in magnifying differences of opinion that are inevitable in even the most model household.

The Kaiser never failed to manifest gratitude to Dr. Hinzpeter, who took him from the nursery and ruled him pedagogically until he matriculated at the University of Bonn. To me Hintzpeter was very narrow in his mental and philosophical view of life. He regarded America only as a nursery of dangerous political theories, and was puzzled to explain the reasons which could permit friendship between his royal pupil and a lad whom he regarded as a half-tamed savage. His contempt for America was lofty—one seemed to hear a Harvard verdict on Yalensian lapses. America, according to Hinzpeter, had produced nothing since 1492—nothing which the civilized world could recognize as a benefit. But he made an exception in favor of one Carey, an ardent advocate of "protectionism" as a fixed policy.

The Kaiser early became familiar with medieval doctrines of statecraft which gained the more importance from receiving the warm support of Bismarck. Every nation in turn has been fascinated or poisoned by the theory that we can create wealth by means of taxing imports. This theory caused the fiscal ruin of Spain, while freedom of commerce enriched Venice and Holland. Germany was in my youth a happy example of low tariff—or tariff restricted to the needs of government. These United States were also prospering under the same principles of commercial freedom—in the pre-Civil War days.

But Bismarck leaned more and more in his later years to the notion that Germany could get along without purchasing from other countries provided she had colonies of her own. Jealousy of England became general in Germany—then distrust—then hatred and finally clamor for war. To determine how far William II fostered these unchristian prejudices and how far he was himself pushed forward by them is not a grateful task for me to undertake today. But the study of his early life—his "Aus meinem Leben"—helps us to appreciate the imponderable forces which made of him so paradoxical a Kaiser—an ardent Christian-Socialist—a champion of laws beneficial to wage earners and at the same time a colonial expansionist and advocate of big naval expenditure.

The seeds of 1914 were sown by Bismarck when he drew his country into the plausible policy of seeking the greatness of Germany by injuring the commerce of England. William II revered Bismarck and was his pupil in statecraft during the years immediately preceding his elevation to the throne in 1888. But while he revered the Nestor of German politics—the unifier of the Fatherland—he noted with regret that while Moltke trained a school of soldiers to succeed him, the great Bismarck jealously kept all his underlings at arm's length—save only his beloved son Herbert. When, therefore, the inevitable break occurred between Kaiser and Chancellor there was no Vice Chancellor at his elbow. Herbert also "went on strike," a "sympathetic strike." Maybe they anticipated the visit of a penitent Kaiser beseeching father and son to return and rule both him and his country as heretofore. It was a grave moment in the life of the new Emperor and I am sure that he did not act without much serious, if not prayerful, preparation. The situation was acute. Bismarck pretended to such a position as had been held by the Tycoons of Japan and William II was invited to lead a life of innocuous desuetude as Mikado of Germany. The Kaiser acted as a Kaiser should and Bismarck retired in sulky mood to feed the press of Europe with interviews intended to embarrass his successor. He did over and over again acts for which in the days of his grandeur he committed others to prison, yet never a censuring word fell from the lips of his magnanimous monarch.

The Former Kaiser and His Wife, 1881.

Indeed, the reader of these memoirs will be astonished by the constant kindliness, not to say good-humor, of their author as he passes in review the notable figures that impressed him in his youth. For Queen Victoria and Prince Albert he had affection second only to that which he showed for his father and mother—and also for his brother, Henry, the Sailor Prince. His narrative is lightened by many illustrative and amusing anecdotes arising from his many visits to the venerable grandmother of Windsor and Balmoral. Indeed, the book has hardly an instance of downright spite against any one; although to such as have been behind the diplomatic scenes and are trained to read between the lines it is easy to feel his opinion of Herbert Bismarck as of the Crown Prince Rudolf of Austria. But, where he can say kindly things, he does so—as, for instance, his great esteem for the venerable Franz Joseph of Austria and his beautiful Empress of tragic memory. He expresses no important opinion of either Edward VII or Nicholas II—proof enough to me that he admired neither the one nor the other—at least not in his Crown Princely years.

The Former Kaiser at the Age of About Four.

To those who recall the campaign of press vilification evoked by Morell Mackenzie during the closing days of the late Frederick the Noble at San Remo (1888) the pages given to this period will prove startling in their simplicity and their value as historical record. That Caledonian charlatan had acquired over the spirit of the Crown Princess Victoria an ascendency only explicable to such as appreciate the vagaries produced by religious excitement. The British press united with ours in distorting every act of William II and finally in convincing the world in general that he was a monster of cruelty and ingratitude toward his parents. We know these waves of defamation in our political campaigns and we recall the blind fury of the Dreyfus days. But never was man more maliciously attacked by every sort of paper or in more different lands and languages than was the author of these memoirs in 1887 and beyond. Had any such attacks been aimed at a Roosevelt or a Bismarck when those men held official rule, there would have been instant counter-attack. But from William II came never a word in all those years—excepting in private intercourse.

Have I said overmuch good of the Kaiser? That was not my intention. The Kaiser pursued a policy which to my mind was bound to end in tragedy. It should have been enough to rule the strongest army in Europe without challenging on the high seas the most powerful and most beneficent navy ever created. He was perhaps deceived by enthusiasts or carried away by a thirst for novelty. Germany was in those years fanatically dreaming of colonies that should be better administered than those of England and a source of supply to manufacturers at home. The Kaiser breathed the tainted air of these noisy protectionists, expansionists and chauvinists and—we must all pay the price of undue exaltation. It is the fashion to fawn upon the man in power and correspondingly [illegible] him when in exile—but history has a more serious task.

This book is good historical material and therefore deserves respectful treatment. The Kaiser, like Jefferson Davis, is the embodiment of a lost cause. He fought long and fiercely but God was not with him—at least not the God whose preferences are for the heaviest battalions. Like Jefferson Davis, William II retired before an enemy he could no longer withstand. The mob howls at the Kaiser as our people did at the President of the late Confederate States. Each was charged with cowardice for seeking to make his escape. The same people would probably have said the same thing of Napoleon I when he abandoned his troops in the Russian Winter of 1812, or when he took refuge in the arms of England after the loss of Waterloo. It is a matter between these rulers and their conscience whether or not it had been better for Napoleon to have blown his brains out after his defeat by Wellington or for Davis to have done the same when Richmond fell. Brave men rarely question another's courage, particularly at such a moment as the downcrash of an empire. I have known many men of moral and physical courage—but none more personally chivalrous and brave than the now exiled Kaiser. Let others than myself cast stones at him.

"Bob" Davis Tells a Yarn or Two

OVER MY LEFT SHOULDER. By Robert H. Davis. 350 pp. New York: D. Appleton & Co. $2.50.

NOBODY would ever think of calling the author of this book "Robert H. Davis" to his face. It is doubtful whether the owner of that name would recognize it by sound, for he is universally hailed as "Bob." He has never been enough concerned about the dignity of his position as editor to insist upon the "Mr." or the full name, nor has he ever been much given to formality in addressing others. A very brief acquaintance usually suffices to place him on a friendly footing with any person he may happen to meet. All this has an important bearing upon his success as a reporter and editor and helps to explain how his memory has become the storehouse of intimate and amusing reminiscences about people of all sorts from bartenders and prizefighters to men and women high in the worlds of literature, art and public life. Bob Davis could undoubtedly fill a dozen volumes with such reminiscences as he has recorded here, but we shall have to be content, for the present at least, with the selection he has made.

The first chapter in the book bears the title "Concerning the Most Dramatic Moment of My Life," which might lead one to believe that the climax comes at the beginning of the volume. But the events narrated in that chapter took place when Bob Davis was a boy of 14, and their dramatic quality is largely a matter of perspective. Thrilling though they must have been to the lad who played one of the leading parts, seen through the mist of years they belong among those memories of younger days that the mature man looks back upon with amusement not unmixed with astonishment as his narrow escape from disastrous consequences. An attempt to help a bartender to collect a debt of $82.50 from a blind musician without the musician's knowledge or consent is an experience calculated to stick in a boy's memory, particularly when the boy happens to be a minister's son.

Perhaps the most interesting chapters in the book are those dealing with O. Henry. The friendship between Bob Davis and O. Henry began when Davis was commissioned by The Sunday World to find O. Henry and engage him to write introductions to Sunday stories for The World. Later, when Davis became editor of the Munsey publications, he made a seven-year contract for first reading of O. Henry's entire output. Many letters passed between them, and a few of these are given in the book. Here is a sample letter:

Why, then, voices being raised against the at emancipator of toiling and eating humanity, the liberating chine? Why do the heathen who d with Bertrand Russell rage inst the menace of mass produc- n, and why do Christian thinkers Guglielmo Ferrero share their rs? The answer is that the sen- ce pronounced in Eden is being shed, but in favor of a new equally onerous and, as some k, even more debilitating judg- nt. Men are being sentenced to ure. Thou shalt consume, in geometrically increasing quantities, iron, steel, platinum, gold, silver, copper, pomade, talcum, attar of roses, rubber, silk, wool, rayon, alligator skin, both real and imitation, soap, coal tar, radium. The buyers for the big stores and the little stores—neither storm nor flood shall stay them in their appointed courses over the face of the earth in quest of materials for the higher standard of living. These things must be because man has eaten of the fruit of the tree of knowledge and has invented the Machine and he must now reckon with the Overhead.

THAT is why to Ferrero, anticipating by several years Henry Ford's plea for the five-day work week and the augmentation of leisure, the new freedom is so menacing. Henry Ford makes no concealment of his purpose. He wants an extra number of hours outside the factory in order that mankind may develop new demands for time-killing devices, among other things for a moderately priced, four-cylinder, two-speed car, particularly excellent at hill-climbing. And industry in general is moving toward mass leisure as the essential condition for mass consumption—of housing and clothes, of radio and music machines, of school desks and laboratory microscopes. The so-called iron law of wages, if it ever had validity, is now in the discard. It is no longer true, if it was ever true, that the employer strives to pay his workers just enough to keep them in condition as machine feeders. The producer confessedly has become a customer. The importance of the working masses outside the mill is moving to overtop their importance inside the shop:

> At the present moment there is only one tyrant in western civilization, but it is pitiless. It is that innumerable fire-driven company of giants of iron and steel that force us to work and play without respite, willy nilly, for the simple reason that if the wealthy, the middle classes, and the masses sought to live more simply, the great world machine would stop.

Play, "without respite," has become an obligation. Ask certain advocates of the new leisure if there is to be a choice in the matter of spending the added free hours, and they will hesitate. Suppose a person doesn't want to play and thereby create a market for play commodities and accessories? Suppose he prefers to spend the extra hours in sleep? Suppose he wants to loaf and invite his soul without exercising additional purchasing power? Suppose he wants to tend his garden, frolic with the children, get acquainted with his wife, and otherwise engage in non-statistical occupations? That would hardly be the kind of goods consumption which the new philosophy of consumption has in mind. Man has leisure, but Modern man no longer has a right to rest. He must work and amuse himself though it cost him his life. "Die, but produce and consume," is the cry of the age. Little by little, work and pleasure eat into the sleeping hours of man, who has not yet invented a machine to prolong time. We no longer know how to sleep.

In one respect the case has, of course, been overstated. Henry Ford cannot be accepted as the sole spokesman for the philosophy of the new leisure and the new consumption. Other spokesmen have emphasized the need of stimulating the consumption of non-factory commodities. The American Federation of Labor, for instance, says it wants a five-day week, in order that its dues-paying members may have more time to be better citizens, book readers, symphony patrons, art gallery visitors. Leisure as the indispensable condition for the enhancement of the individual life is a commonplace. Reference has been made above to books and plays and Einstein and Millikan as items in the new popular consumption. Mention of school desks and laboratory equipment as part of the new standard of living is not altogether inadvertence. Let it be conceded that it is the purpose of the shorter work-day and work-week to release the mass of mankind for the consumption of ideas and emotions as well as automobiles, radio, patent roofing and bathroom fixtures.

YET even in the humanistic field, in thought, in the arts, the speed of the machine has affected the pace of life, and here, too, mass production compels mass consumption. The output of new scientific discoveries, new ideas, new arts, new philosophies keeps mounting, and the customer must keep up. Ferrero is speaking of the disappearance of standards when he speaks of "a generation which, when called upon to judge works of art, perpetually hesitates, changes its opinion every six months, contradicts itself from one season to another, admires and glorifies at the falling of the leaves what it has execrated at their birth, and forgets both love and hate the following Spring." Primarily, this is not the behavior of a fickle generation but the behavior of an overdriven, exploited generation, saddled with a new commandment, the obligation to consume. In the sweat of thy face thou shall consume, simultaneously or in rapid succession, Post-Impressionism, futurism, cubism, negro art, H. G. Wells, James Joyce, Proust, Dreiser, Sherwood Anderson, Cabell, Freud, Croce, Jung, the Behaviorists, the Eugenists, the Neo-Realists, the Neo-Idealists, the Humb Plan, the Soviet plan, the Baltimore & Ohio Plan, the atom, the electron, the quantum, the colloid, the stand, the hormone, the Ku Klux, the Charleston, beauty, Pan, Aphrodite, Einstein.

Einstein summarizes the tragedy. When first it was announced that Einstein had revolutionized the cosmos but that it was doubtful whether there were half a dozen men alive who could understand Einstein, there must have been more than one consumer to wipe the sweat from his face and smile wanly. Here was at least one commandment removed. In view of the fact that Einstein was not understandable there could obviously be no obligation to try to understand Einstein. It was not to be. Mass consumption continued to function. There came lectures on Einstein, A B C's on Einstein, Nutshells of Einstein. The women's clubs organized classes to study Einstein. There was leisure, but there was no rest for the well-mounting.

"A Barking Ghost"

MISS LOUELLA D. EVERETT, Boston, Mass.—The poem from which A. S. L. quotes the closing lines (Nov. 7) is "The Curate Thinks You Have No Soul," and the author is St. John Lucas, an English writer who edited "The Oxford Book of French Verse," "The Rose-Winged Hours," and other anthologies. This poem is on page 130 of Robert Frothingham's excellent "Songs of Dogs," and in L. N. Kinnicutt's "To Your Dog and My Dog," both volumes published by Houghton Mifflin Company, and in "The Dog's Book of Verse," compiled by J. Earl Clauson and published by Small, Maynard & Co. I send a copy of the poem for A. S. L.

THE CURATE THINKS YOU HAVE NO SOUL.
St. John Lucas.

The curate thinks you have no soul;
I know that he has none. But you,
Dear friend, whose solemn self-control
In our four-square familiar pew,
Was pattern to my youth—whose bark
Called me in summer dawns to rove—
Have you gone down into the dark
Where none is welcome—none may love?
I will not think those good brown eyes
Have spent their light of truth so soon;
But in some canine paradise
Your wraith, I know, rebukes the moon,
And quarters every plain and hill,
Seeking his master * * * As for me,
This prayer at least the gods fulfill:
That when I pass the flood and see
Old Charon by the Stygian coast
Take toll of all the shades who land,
Your little, faithful barking ghost
May leap to lick my phantom hand.

Lucy S. McClary, Windsor, Vt., and Amy Vellier, New York, also contributed the poem, a copy of which has been sent to our correspondent.

"Burdens"

BATEMAN PARHAM HARRELL, Lafayette, La.—L. C. M., in your issue of Oct. 31, requests the name of the author of a poem beginning "Any one can carry his burden, however heavy, till nightfall," &c. I have found this quotation in an illustrated calendar for the year 1919, published by the Dodge Publishing Company at 148 West Twenty-third Street, New York. In this calendar the name of the author of the poem is not given, which leads me to believe that this is an anonymous quotation. As the Dodge Publishing Company publishes illustrated calendars, framed mottoes, &c., perhaps it can furnish L. C. M. with this poem.

"A City Four Square"

MISS JOSEPHINE B. TERWILLIGER, Mount Vernon, N. Y.—No doubt J. M. B., in your issue of Nov. 7, refers to the poem by John R. Clements, set to music by H. P. Danks, entitled "No Night There." It contains the lines wanted by your correspondent as follows: "In the land of fadeless day lies the city four-square; it shall never pass away, and there is no night there."

Anna Louise Salmon, Albany, N. Y.; A. H. Kirkland, Concord Depot, Va., and M. V. Eisemeyer, Queensboro, N. C., also contributed the poem, and a copy has been sent to J. M. B.

"Human Nature"

MISS MARGARET MORRISSEY, Springfield, Mass.—The poem "A Receipt for a Christmas Pudding," for which E. P. U. asked in your issue of Nov. 14 is as follows:

THE CHRISTMAS PUDDING.
(A Recipe.)

Take some human nature, as you find it,
The commonest variety will do;
Put a little graciousness behind it,
Add a lump of charity, or two.

Squeeze in just a drop of moderation
Half as much frugality, or less
Add some very fine consideration,
Strain off all of poverty's distress.

Pour some milk of human kindness in it,
Put in all the happiness you can;
Stir it up with laughter every minute,
Season with good will toward every man.

Set it on the fire of heart's affection,
Leave it till the jolly bubbles rise;

TROPIC DEATH
by Eric Walrond
is as authentic as a negro spiritual

Just as you hear the intensity of the tropics in the spirituals, so you hear them in the rhythms of this book of stories that is the outstanding literary contribution by a negro writer No white writer has ever been able to give such a native sense of this life.

Instinctively, in reading these stories you feel yourself there, along these hot Caribbean shores, among these black, mulatto and white people and deeper inside their lives than any other writer has been able to get you. And you do not wonder that such writers as Carl Van Vechten, William Beebe, T. S. Stribling, Mrs. Dunbar, and Robert Herrick, themselves interested in this life, have praised this book so highly. 2nd Edition. $2.50.

Queries and Answers

This department is designed to assist in the location of complete versions of poems and their sources, the names of authors, &c., which cannot be found through the usual channels of anthologies and books of reference. THE TIMES receives a great many more queries than it can publish. It endeavors, therefore, to select those of the greatest general interest. Queries should be addressed to the Editor of Queries and Answers, NEW YORK TIMES. They should be written on one side of the paper only, and must contain the name and address of the writer as evidence of good faith.

QUERIES

"Ignatius Loyola"

H. H.—I would deeply appreciate learning from you or one of your readers who the author is of "The Jesuit."

This is the story of the life of Ignatius Loyola. I read it in Russian some twenty years ago and would very much like to procure a copy now, if I can find out where it can be purchased.

"Tomorrow"

G. B.—The writer would be glad to know who is the author of these lines:

Should some great angel say to me tomorrow,
Thou must retreat thy pathway from the start,
But God will grant, in pity for thy sorrow,
Some one dear wish, the nearest of thy heart.

"Emogene"

J. M.—Please help me find the author and complete poem which I heard forty years ago as follows:

I swear by the Virgin that none in your stead
Shall husband to Emogene be,
* * * * * * *
The tables they groaned with the weights of the feast
Nor yet had the laughter and merriment ceased
When the bells in the castle tolled one.

"From Chauteaubriand"

S. A. T.—Is there a translation into English verse by any well-known writers of Chauteaubriand's poem "Combien j'ai douce souvenance," and can you quote any such?

"Hail the North and South"

R. E. P.—Can you tell me where I may get the old army poem written in the '50s, which begins:

Hail to the North and all hail to the South,
Nations are born at the cannon's mouth.
There is sometimes a rain and there is sometimes a drought.

"Tim Finnegan"

LeR. G.—Does any one know where I may find the complete poem, the first three lines of which are:

Tim Finnegan lived in Walker Street,
A gentleman Irishman, I might add.
His brogue it was so rich and sweet.

"Land of Beginning"

F. B. W.—I want to find a poem written as an answer to the famous one by Louisa Fletcher entitled "The Land of Beginning Again." I have the latter. The answer to this poem that I seek contains the same sentiment as that one and I am very eager to get a copy of it.

"A Mighty Monarch"

S. L. W.—Where can I find the rest of the poem by John Godfre: Saxe of which the following is the first stanza?

A mighty monarch in the days of old
Made offer of high honor, wealth and gold
To one who should produce in form concise
A motto for his guidance, terse yet wise.
A precept soothing in his hours forlorn,
Yet one that in his prosperous days would warn.

"Mrs. Mulligatawney"

A. M. G.—Would some one tell me the name of the author of a humorous little poem called "Mrs. Mulligatawney"? I am anxious to get permission to use the poem in an English text book for the fourth grade. The poem begins:

Mrs. Mulligatawney said, "I think it's going to rain."
Mr. Mulligatawney said, "To me that's very plain."

"A Two-Penny Lunch"

A. L.—I would like to have the author's name and the title of the poem of which these lines are a part:

There's a two-penny lunch in Dover Street,
With a dingy sign in the window, "Eat."

"Memory"

W. E. K.—In what book of poetry by John Kendrick Bangs does the little poem, given below, appear:

I wish that as the flower
All through its glorious hour
Pours forth its fragrance rare
And perfumes all the air
With sweetness. So may I,
As o'er my path I ply
Leave in the trail of me
A glorious, gracious memory.

"Stars Must Die"

L. T. K.—Does any one know where I may find the exact wording and the name of the author of these lines: "The stars must die; they are but creature (?) of the sun and wind. But friendship throws her sheet-anchor deep beside the shore of Eternity."

"An Obit"

M. M. D.—The following is quoted in an obituary notice on the death of a British naval officer, a prisoner who died at Fort Fayette, Pa., Feb. 22, 1814. I would like to know whether it is a quotation or a local effort.

Of manners mild, a mind devoid of art,
In him were joined the brave and feeling heart.
To all his friends his memory must be dear,
And e'en his foes will drop a friendly tear.

ANSWERS

"Abraham"

GEORGE D. CHESSON, Springfield, Mass.—Referring to the query of W. H. H. in your issue of Nov. 28, the poem, "The Sacrifice of Abraham," was written by Nathaniel Parker Willis, born in Portland, Me., 1807, and died at his estate on the Hudson, above West Point, 1867. The lines quoted by your correspondent are those beginning as follows: "Morn breaketh in the east. The purple clouds are putting on their gold and violet." The poem is a very long one and may be found in the section "Sacred Poems" in his complete "Poems." Miss Eleanor F. Hogan, New York City, sent in the poem. James F. Morton, Paterson, N. J., also answered this request.

"When I Am Gone"

MISS FLORENCE SAMELSON, Woodhaven, N. Y.—In answer to the request of E. K. M. in your issue of Nov. 28 for the author of the following poem, I am glad to send the information. The poem is as follows:

RETURN.
By Adaline H. Tatemas.

When I am gone,
Do not think
That I shall not Return
Again.
Often will you
See me
In the rain
That sweeps across the emerald meadows.
Or when Lilacs bloom,
And in the moonlight room you hear
A sleepy bird call from the orchard.
I shall come
To you;
Also
At the moment of your most exquisite joy;
But, oh, dear one,
The hour when I shall be Nearest you
Is when your heart is breaking from some new grief;
Then, then shall I
Indeed
Be near you.

Miss Louella D. Everett, Boston, Mass.; Miss Sylvia B. Hendler (no address), and L. C. Rega, Brooklyn, N. Y., contributed copies of the poem, one of which has been sent to our correspondent. The latter tells us that it appeared in The Herald-Tribune during September, 1926. David Mahoney, N. Y., also answered this request.

"A Song Bird in Heaven"

A. RAY WILKERSON, Richmond, Va.—Referring to the query of M. B. in your issue of Oct. 24 for the song that contains the lines: "They needed a song bird in Heaven, so God took Caruso away," it may be obtained from the music publisher, Jack Mills, Inc., at 148 West Forty-sixth Street, New York. The lyric is by George A. Little, the music by Jack Stanley. The idea was suggested by George Walter Brown.

A copy of the sheet music has been contributed by Bobby F. German, Brooklyn, N. Y., and has been sent to our correspondent. Miss Maeanna C. Mangle, Fordham, N. Y., and Archie Goldhor, Sea Gate, N. Y., sent in the words. William J. Doemich, New York; Mrs. May C. Pickens, New Paltz, N. Y., and Mrs. N. E.

Charles William Eliot

From the Portrait By Charles Hopkinson

Eliot Struck the Shackles From College Education

Two Books Which Record the Vital Share He Had in Our National Development

THE LIFE OF CHARLES W. ELIOT. By Edward H. Cotton. 434 pp. Boston: Small, Maynard & Co. $3.

CHARLES W. ELIOT, The Man and His Beliefs. Edited with a Biographical study, by William Allan Neilson. Two volumes. 790 pp. New York: Harper & Brothers. $10.

THERE are some men who lend themselves to biography that is as absorbing to read as fiction. These are the men of dramatic and spectacular achievements. Others there are whose importance in history is little if any less, but because there was little of the dramatic in their lives, and nothing of the spectacular, their biographies seem toneless and not remarkably interesting. To be sure, the distinction is superficial; there can be as much of true drama in a play that moves quietly as in one that screams itself all over the stage, as every real judge of the theatre knows. And there can be as much of true drama in a life which moves with every outward semblance of serenity, with a complete absence of the spectacular.

Such a life was that led by the late President of Harvard College, whose biography by Edward H. Cotton has just been published. The book was completed before the death of Dr. Eliot, but at his request—the manuscript had his approval—publication was deferred. Dr. Cotton will be recalled as the author of "The Ideals of Theodore Roosevelt" and "Theodore Roosevelt the American." And to be considered with the Cotton biography—also approved by President Eliot for posthumous publication—are two volumes of collected writings assembled under the title, "Charles W. Eliot, the Man and His Beliefs," edited by William Allan Neilson, now President of Smith College.

President Eliot once made the remark: "Nobody's name lives in this world—to be blessed—who has not associated his life with some kind of human emancipation, physical, mental or moral." Despite the grammatical slip (the relative pronoun is without an antecedent), proof that the dictum is quoted from memory and is not precisely as laid down by the speaker, the sentiment expressed is so clearly from the brain of Dr. Eliot that it may well serve by way of introduction. President Eliot devoted his life to the task of liberalizing education and freeing collegiate instruction from many of its age-old shackles.

As every one knows, the one great change in American educational methods associated with the name of President Eliot was the adoption at Harvard of the so-called "elective system," under which the student was permitted to exercise personal choice among courses of study. Yet, although this is supposed to have been an innovation originating in the mind of Dr. Eliot, supposition is here at variance with fact. The fact is that before Eliot became President of Harvard something resembling an elective system had been in vogue. Dr. Thomas Hill was President immediately before Eliot. Before Hill had come Jared Sparks. And before Sparks was Josiah Quincy, during whose administration there had grown up some semblance of elective freedom. If not formally abolished, this privilege had lapsed under Sparks and Hill, and, although, as established and developed by Eliot, so that instead of haphazard and limited election of studies there came into being a wide system of correlated courses, it is only fair to say that actually the idea was not Eliot's, and was not new.

One is led to wonder how it came about that Charles W. Eliot, Professor of Chemistry at Harvard, should have been elected President at the age of 35. The facts are plain, the history is there for all to read; and the more one reads the more the puzzle grows. The Board of Overseers and the Corporation of Harvard were composed of practical men of affairs, bankers and merchants of Boston predominating, and it is easy to see that they recognized in Eliot a man of exceptional sagacity, tenacity and integrity. His youth they probably never considered a drawback. But, and here was the rub, Professor Eliot was a scientist—and his immediate predecessors in the executive chair had been ministers of the Gospel, Doctors of Divinity. These bankers and merchants, men of affairs, set vast store by the clergy. The one really great drama in Eliot's life was the one in which he had no part—the drama going on in the minds and the consciences of those practical but staid men who voted the Professor of Science into the chair which had been virtually a sacred office.

It would be impracticable, even if it were possible, to follow in any detail the career of President Eliot at Harvard. He began his program of reforms at once, and not even the masterly style of the inaugural address which he delivered in October, 1869, could have been sufficient to allay the fears of the conservative minority which had voted against his election. That the young man, however, was skilled beyond most in his manipulation of the English language none could deny, even if none had listened after the reading of the first paragraph.

The college controversies (said Mr. Eliot) as to whether language, philosophy, mathematics or science supplies the best mental training, whether general education should be chiefly literary or chiefly scientific, have no practical lesson for us today. This university recognizes no real antagonism between literature and science, and consents to no such narrow alternatives. We would have them all, and at their best. To observe keenly, to reason soundly, and to imagine vividly are operations as essential as that of clear and forcible expression; and to develop one of these faculties it is not necessary to repress and dwarf the others. * * * Truth and right are above utility in all realms of thought and action.

For those who are not acquainted with the usual structural organization of universities an interpolation may be in order; if overseers elect and corporations or trustees affirm, it is not with these bodies that the President must chiefly live, but with that body of men, the teaching staff, universally known as the Faculty. And it was battling for his life within this den of far from gentle lions that President Eliot quickly found himself. But for once the lions confronted a sacrifice unwilling to be a martyr.

It was a doctor on the medical faculty who precipitated the decisive engagement. "How is it, I should like to ask," came the bland inquiry, "that this Faculty has gone on for eighty years managing its own affairs, and now within three or four months is proposed to change all our mode of carrying on the school —it seems very extraordinary, and I should like to know how it happens."

To which the suave Eliot made startling rejoinder: "I can ans Dr. ———'s question very ea There is a new President."

The scene as here recorded is fr the description given by Dr. Oli Wendell Holmes in a letter to M ley. At first not even Dr. Holm could see more than a modicum good in President Eliot's ma changes, and with whimsical bitt ness he complains to Motley in a other letter: "Our new Preside Eliot has turned the university ov like a flapjack." Eventually, ho ever, rather soon, in fact, Holm saw the wisdom of the foresight new pilot, and, taking Eliot's pa became one of his stanchest su porters. That not all of Preside Eliot's proposed changes were for t best was proved, a good many yea later, in connection with this sam division of the university, the med cal school. Following the President lead and the example set by the la school, where every desired resu had been obtained during the decad between 1890 and 1900, it was d creed that the medical school al should be strictly a graduate depar ment, and the possession of a bach lor's degree required of candidat for admission. The plan did not wo out advantageously and was subs quently modified. Rarely did th happen with President Eliot changes, however. As the baseb writers would put it, his batting a erage was remarkably high.

Speaking of baseball and sportin writers, it was in respect to his att tude on the overemphasis on sport or what he believed to be an ove emphasis, among undergraduates a graduates alike, that he encounter greatest hostility. In a way, it w Dr. Eliot himself who started at letic competition; at least, he h much to do with it, rowing on Ha vard's first crew. Nevertheless, D Eliot could not reconcile himself the increasing importance athleti assumed in the period, roughl speaking, between 1895 and 190 and he spoke and wrote on the ma ter both frequently and vehement Probably there actually was t much attention paid to a small list competitive sports, and not enou attention paid to the physical bette ment of the undergraduate body a whole. But neither undergradua nor graduates took kindly to t President's attitude, and the feeli against Dr. Eliot ran higher than any other time in his career, wi the possible exception of his initi years when he was in more or le continuous conflict with the Facult But Eliot stood firm—as was h wont. What was probably the cl max came in 1908, when two men bers of the varsity crews, alrea headed for the quarters at Red To to enter on the last weeks of trai ing for the races against Yale, we discovered purloining a book from t college library. The athletes we immediately suspended; and imm diately protests began to pour h Theodore Roosevelt, the President the United States, sent a telegram Eliot. This is the reply he receive

Each man did a dishonest thing * * * A keen and sure sense of honor being the finest result o college life, I think the college an graduates should condemn effec tively dishonorable conduct. The college should also teach that one must never do scurvy things in the supposed interest or for the pleas ure of others.

It may be objected by the reade that this instance is less a matter athletics than of morals, but th point is that the underlying cau was the absorption of interest sports to the exclusion of all els And President Eliot's stand is base exclusively on his early enunciat of his guiding principle of emancip tion.

What was probably the most curi ous undertaking on the part of Pres ident Eliot was his denaturing the divinity school in the year 190 The divinity school, as a separat department of instruction, dated ba nearly a century. This was th period when New England wa shaken to its theological foundation by the Unitarian movement, and Ha

An American Ass Confesses His Asininity

THE GREAT AMERICAN ASS. An Autobiography. Anonymous. 316 pp. New York: Brentano's. $3.50.

EVER since the day when Rousseau flung on a startled world his more or less immortal "Confessions" the urge to public self-castigation has seized both men and women at various times and in many lands. The psychology of confession has been studied by more than one able scientist, while many laymen who have learned the argot only talk glibly on the subject. But psychology has little, if any, place in literary criticism. If the exhibition of the writer's soul, or viscera, or what one will, has social value, the critic may note the fact. But he is not concerned with it. If the work has historical value he is not primarily concerned with that either. To be sure, these restrictions considerably narrow the critic's field, but he should rigidly impose them upon himself, especially when there are other books with rights to space.

If one were free to pursue discursively the many "leads" (to use a newspaper term) opened up by the anonymous autobiography "The Great American Ass," the study would run to unconscionable proportions. In addition to the "case" in morbid psychology already hinted at, there is material for a fresh consideration of the Puritan; there is the sidelight thrown on the social import of the colonization of the Western States by immigrant stock; there is the ever-recurrent but ever-new spectacle of the conflict of the West with the East as it is fought out—with victory usually to the West—in America's literary forcing ground, New York.

Considered purely as a venture in the literary field, "The Great American Ass" leaves much to be desired. But the same may be said of Rousseau. Had the Frenchman chosen to write innumerable witty essays, such as were turned out in such abundance by his famous predecessor Montaigne, he would, perhaps, have been as highly exalted by his successors. But Rousseau preferred the course he took; and to call attention to this fact is only another and roundabout way of saying that this type of autobiographical writing is not, and can not in the nature of things be, a fruitful subject for literary criticism. One reads Rousseau for one of two reasons—to understand his relation to the French Revolution and (let us be frank) to behold a not very sweet life in complete nakedness. The anonymous writer of "The Great American Ass," it need scarcely be said, is not a Jean Jacques historically. He inaugurated no movement, and no movement will be inaugurated as a result of anything he has to say. As an exposure of a life neither sweet nor happy, perhaps, the book justifies itself. But whether it justifies itself is purely a matter for the individual to decide. Some will say there has been already too much confession; others that there can never be too much, perhaps even not enough.

The author of "The Great American Ass" calls himself Roy Bradley, "the son of Puritan Roundheads from Massachusetts." The family had migrated to "Wilber," Neb. (not to be searched for on a map), "exotically discovered for you in Willa Cather's 'O Pioneers.'" The book, therefore, may be regarded in the light of a sociological accompaniment to Miss Cather's novels. Perhaps there is something of envy of Miss Cather, perhaps not, in the following passage. One can't always tell about these book writers—it may be advertising:

> Our neighbors were largely those Bohemians that the Cather girl was for recording. But we Bradleys were the Americans; our living story writ large across a continent. It was the Virginia girl who sang the Bohemians' new America, and is lauded for it. While I, the Yankee cub nursed on the milk of Massachusetts legend and reared up to roar the Yankee triumphs, am an ass in the wilderness of frustration—and here I bray the lay of the Great American Ass.

As Professor Barrett Wendell used to say, with the tailor-made Oxford accent that furnished amusement for restive undergraduates, "There's something there!" The descendant of the Puritan has been forced into the background by every immigrant stock with which he has endeavored to dispute the ground. Why? At the same time he has molded that stock—the conquered has molded the conqueror. Again, why?

If "The Great American Ass" helps to solve this by no means unimportant problem, then it passes out of the realm of merely morbid self-castigation, out of the field of exhibitionism, and assumes documentary value. Not so thoroughly as it might—being too self-centred—the book does do just this thing. The ass's bray is a tocsin. Bigotry, intolerance, narrow-minded conviction that a man or a people is the chosen of the Lord—"Roy Bradley" squares off against them all. The Puritan, the Yankee, is still falling back on every front. If he cares to learn something of the reason of his defeat (but he must practice humility to do it) there is a message for him here.

Mr. Spaeth Rummages Among the Sentimental Ballads And Comic Songs of Yesterday

READ 'EM AND WEEP. By Sigmund Spaeth. 367 pp. New York: Doubleday, Page & Co. $4.*

By D. E. WHEELER

EACH generation likes to rummage in the attic of its predecessor to see what it can find in the way of forgotten mementos that may be dusted off and admired—or ridiculed. Some such activity has been going on for the last few years, not alone among household relics—many of which, once scorned, have become cherished antiques—but also in the larger and more important world of ideas and manners. Both Mark Sullivan in "Our Times" and Thomas Beer in "The Mauve Decade" have successfully raked over the remains of a past era still glimmering in contemporary memory, and delighted us with their discoveries.

Quite in keeping with this retrospective trend, Sigmund Spaeth, the lively and perspicacious author of "The Common Sense of Music" and "Barber Shop Ballads," has been doing some rummaging on his own account in the garret of "the songs you forgot to remember," to borrow the subtitle of his latest and most amusing book.

Shrewdly, and in his opening paragraph, Mr. Spaeth disarms any pundits by disclaiming all efforts at scholarship, and defines his purpose as solely that of entertainment. Also, he confines his choice of material to that which "is either consciously or unconsciously amusing." But almost in the same breath he challot ges a host of witnesses which, if the present reviewer is any judge of the type, will not remain voiceless after they have conned his material on the basis of his preliminary pronouncement:

> The following collection contains whatever is printable of those old songs of sentiment, melodrama and ribaldry that seem worth preserving.

Look out for the deluge, Mr. Spaeth! From every point of the compass will come cities that you have omitted in your opus, words and music of songs that will flout your supposed ignorance of them, and complaint and entreaty about the "classics" that you ignored. This protest is inevitable when one considers the accumulation of popular song material in the past century—the epoch, generally speaking, that the compiler sets himself to cover—together with the variety of tastes to be met. From William Delaney himself—a pioneer of Tin Pan Alley technique, whom, by the way, Mr. Spaeth has overlooked—we have learned that he published the words of some 20,000 songs in his thirty-four years of business. And the author of "Read 'Em and Weep" could use less than 200 specimens in his bright galaxy!

Nevertheless, Mr. Spaeth has rummaged with sharp eye and attuned ear among the songs of the genre he sought, and despite his limits of space—any collector would need a volume the size of Stevenson's "Home Book of Verse" to hold a comprehensive assortment of these native warblings—he has not missed many "wood notes wild"—and not so wild—in his picking.

He divides his work into eight sections: "Early Efforts," "Interlude," "Fashionable Songs of the Fifties," "Reconstruction Days," "Early Miseries," "The Vogue of Harrigan and Hart," "The Golden Age" and "We Moderns," and he opens and closes his dissertation with an "Invocation" and an "Exhortation" which are excellent evidences of his sympathetic-satiric spirit—a spirit that finds further exercise in numerous sprightly footnotes, alone worth the price of admission to his merry show.

Though our ringmaster warns us not to look for learning, we find it tucked in deftly here and there without being too discordant. But it may annoy some sticklers for unalloyed gayety that so much valuable space is taken up with serious accounts of "Yankee Doodle" and "The Star-Spangled Banner," their origins and versions, at the very beginning of the book. However, Mr. Spaeth should be forgiven that for the sake of "Zip Coon" of the vintage of 1815, which is sung to the tune of "Turkey in the Straw," and two sorrowful songs of married life in the same "Early Efforts" section.

But while he was in the period why did not Mr. Spaeth dig up something for us from our first efforts at indigenous opera—or, rather, musical comedy—in "The Disappointment," by Colonel Tom Forest; "The Archers," by Smith and Pelissier, or "The Saw Mill," by Micah Hawkins?

In the next three sections, over which we must rapidly skim, roughly covering the years between 1880 and 1890, Mr. Spaeth furnishes the words and tunes of "full many a gem of purest ray serene," both rough-and-ready and painfully polite in character. Of the former class, nothing could exceed the immortal ballad of "Frankie and Johnnie" with its haunting refrain, "He was her man, and he done her wrong." This is given with variations and evident relish. It is a folksong (if we have any) of coarse and lasting texture. Hailing its inclusion with pleasure, we mourned the absence of a near relative, "The Cowboy's Lament," which might have been preferred by those of strong tastes to some of the excess given in political balladry. Of the polite sort, nothing could be more gay and grave, respectively, than "Croquet" and "We Never Speak as We Pass By." We cannot resist quoting from the latter:

The spell is past, the dream is o'er,
And tho' we meet, we love no more!
One heart is crushed to droop and die,
And for relief must heavenward fly!
The once bright smile is faded, gone,
And given way to looks forlorn!
Despite her grandeur's wicked flame,
She stoops to blush beneath her shame.

Chorus.

We never speak as we pass by,
Altho' a tear bedims her eye;
I know she thinks of her past life,
When we were lovin' man and wife.

This was the lachrymose forerunner of hundreds of songs in kindred vein which have persisted ever since and reached their climax of maudlinism in the nineties.

Drinking songs, temperance songs to counterbalance them, negro melodies culminating in the genius of Stephen Foster, and circus ditties flourished in that half century (1830-80). There was "The Little Brown Jug" of the Wets and "Father, Dear Father, Come Home With Me Now" of the Drys. And the negro convict lament, "Water Boy," which has lately become a favorite concert number with the present generation. Of all the circus songs that arose to tickle the fancy of the public, perhaps "The Man on the Flying Trapeze" was the greatest, and the crowning absurdity of the lot. Mr. Spaeth deserves a special vote of thanks for including it. His book

Florid Days of the Steamboat Prairie Belle

MISSISSIPPI STEAMBOATIN'. By Herbert and Edward Quick. New York: Henry Holt & Co. $3.*

By GARNETT LAIDLAW EBKEW

Dese steamboats on de Hudson,
I guess dey's mighty fine,
But dey ain't got no paddle wheels
A-whirlin' roun' behine
A-kickin' up de water and chawin' up de foam.
De steamboats on de Hudson
Ain't like de boats down home!

Dese steamboats on de Hudson—
Land knows what make 'em go!
Dey ain't like de steamboats—
Dat I uster know
A-sailing down Kanawhy
And de O-hi-O!

Dem great white steamboats
Wid dey smokestacks high,
Blowin' clouds of smoke out
On de wide blue sky,
Whistlin' in de mornin'
Way down erous' de ben'!
Lawsy, how I'd like ter see Dem ole boats once ergain!

"UNC' HENRY GLENN."

THE above quotation is not from the book under discussion but it expresses pretty well the fact that there is a mighty big difference between the steamboats that one is familiar with along the coast of the United States and those that ply the inland waters of America.

Herbert Quick, whose recent death cut short the finishing touches upon his last book, has left an interesting and valuable volume nevertheless. The final pages were completed by his son, Edward Quick. In a well-executed book of 350 pages the author has attempted to cover an extremely large subject. Steamboating days on the Western rivers of the United States extended roughly from 1816 (when the first practical working boat was perfected in the West) down to the last days of the nineteenth century, with a slight overlapping into the twentieth.

The heyday, the golden age, of the steamboat—those gorgeous, florid, easy-going, and none-too-substantial times when the beauty and chivalry, the wealth and the rascality of America, traveled by steamboat—may be said to have occurred between 1845 and 1870, with the Civil War's interruption between. The rest of that period between 1816 and 1900 was taken up with the growth, at the front end, and the sloping off, at the latter end, of the popularity of the steamboat as a common carrier of passengers and freight. This, of course, was due to the encroachments of the railroads.

But during those fine old days of the luxurious packets, there passed along the placid Western rivers a phase of American life which, in the very nature of things, can never be again. It is hard for us to grasp today the importance of the steamboat to the people of the Middle West—to the people of half a continent. To the citizens of those cities which waxed rich and powerful because the steamboat put them in touch with the centres of wealth and refinement, the rivers meant everything. A cross-section of life anywhere in the Middle West (whether on the banks of a big river or far up some little rain-water creek which could accommodate a steamboat about once a year) was a cross-section of activities on the rivers. And the centre of things always was the big white steamboat with twin tall chimneys.

For any one man to attempt to cover all of such a subject in one book would be an ambitious order indeed. The author of "Mississippi Steamboatin'" has apparently made little or no attempt at getting river atmosphere into his book. He has contented himself with writing a straight-out story of the rise of steamboating from the earliest days in the West, and has left the subject, so to say, in mid-air, at the height of steamboating in the 1860s. It is as though the author, realizing that he had too large a subject to cover in one man's book, had said, "Go to, I shall write the story of steamboating!" and then had dug up a big array of interesting facts—half-forgotten data—from the back files of old newspapers and from histories, and put this material into his book.

And the result is good—as far as it goes. There is no denying that here is an interesting and readable con-

When Greeley Was The Tribune

Mr. Seitz's Life of the Great Editor Contains a Serious Attack On the Lincoln Legend

HORACE GREELEY. By Don C. Seitz. Illustrated. 433 pp. Indianapolis: The Bobbs-Merrill Company. $5.

By HORACE GREEN.

IN matters biographical these days are given to debunking history's heroes and occasionally to whitewashing its reprobates. Rupert Hughes and W. E. Woodward have succeeded in removing some of the statuary from Washington; not long ago Meade Minnigerode attempted to prove that the patriotic Hamilton was no saint and that Aaron Burr was further removed from the devil than generally supposed; and others have followed in key. Now comes Mr. Seitz with a life of Horace Greeley, the meatiest part of which, if accepted as the author would have it, is a serious attack on the Lincoln legend. The method is an elaboration of the usual theme that Lincoln was the shrewdest and most cautious of political manipulators; in addition there is new historical material purporting to show that when the circumstance warranted, "Honest Abe" was a downright liar. Many Lincoln students—including this reviewer—will not agree with the author's interpretation of letters and conversations showing how the Great Emancipator removed enemies from his path, nevertheless the chapter on the well-known Lincoln-Greeley struggle is one of the most interesting in Mr. Seitz's voluminous and provocative volume on the Civil War editor.

Mr. Seitz is too good a journalist and historian to advertise his own sympathies, yet it is obvious that they do not lie with Lincoln. From the early days when they served together in Congress Greeley, already an authoritative voice in the new party, exhibited a mild superiority toward the lanky Illinoisan. Greeley wrote in 1848: "He [Lincoln] was then not quite 40 years old; a genial, cheerful, rather comely man, noticeably tall, and the only Whig from Illinois—not remarkable otherwise, to the best of my recollection." And in another case: "He seemed a quiet, good-natured man who did not aspire to leadership and seldom claimed the floor."

The Tribune's primary quarrel with Lincoln as President was that he was temperamentally unfitted to prosecute, and did not prosecute, a vigorous war against the South; that he would never succeed in ending the rebellion by force of arms; that his treatment of foreign emissaries was incorrectly conceived, and that the Cabinet should be entirely reconstructed. The first accusation was the most often reiterated. In view of the fact that Greeley's pen had more authority than that of any single editor in America, his constant, violent screechings were no small burden to the harassed leader. These assaults Greeley followed up with private advices to the White House, of which the following is a curious sample:

New York, Monday, July 29, 1861.
Midnight.

Dear Sir: This is my seventh sleepless night—yours, too, doubtless—yet I think I shall not die, because I have no right to die. I must struggle to live, however bitterly. But to business. You are now considered a great man, and I am a hopelessly broken one. You are now undergoing a terrible ordeal, and God has thrown the gravest responsibilities upon you. Do not fear to meet them. Can the rebels be beaten after all that has occurred, and in view of the actual state of feeling caused by our late awful disaster? If they can—and it is your business to ascertain and decide—write me that such is your judgment, so that I may know and do my duty. And if they cannot be beaten—if our recent disaster is fatal—do not fear to sacrifice yourself to your country. If the rebels are not to be beaten—if that is your judgment in view of all the light you can get—then every drop of blood henceforth shed in this quarrel will be wantonly, wickedly shed, and the guilt will rest heavily on the soul of every promoter of the crime. I pray you to decide quickly, and let me know my duty, &c., &c.

Yours, in the depth of bitterness,
HORACE GREELEY.

It was admitted by others that Greeley suffered from brain fever at the time; nevertheless, he recovered quickly enough to bend to the task of hurrying Lincoln's hand in the Emancipation Proclamation, for which, according to Mr. Seitz, Lincoln gave Greeley no credit.

Early in 1864, when Grant and Sheridan had as yet to furnish victories necessary for Northern morale and Republican politics, it was apparent that Lincoln would have extreme difficulty in being re-elected. Lincoln felt it necessary to placate Greeley, among others, and endeavored to get into touch with the latter, but found him cold. Lincoln even offered, "if I could spare time," to call upon Greeley in New York. Contact was established through one George G. Hoskins of Wyoming County, who called in the morning at the White House. According to the account of D. S. Alexander, in the Lyons (N. Y.) Republican (not printed until Aug. 8, 1921), the President was shaving and Hoskins was permitted to step upstairs; whereupon the President, "clad in undershirt, trousers and slippers," put down the razor and began at once to express a life-long admiration for Mr. Greeley, saying that he regarded the latter as the ablest editor in the United States, if not in the world. Finally, said Lincoln:

"You know, Mr. Hoskins, that Benjamin Franklin was the first Postmaster General, and I have always regretted that I could not in 1861 appoint Mr. Greeley to that office. But I have determined, Mr. Hoskins, if I am re-elected and re-inaugurated, to appoint him Postmaster General. Seward wants to go to England, and that will give me the opportunity. But, in any event, Mr. Hoskins, I shall appoint him. He is worthy of it and my mind is made up. • • •"

Hoskins reached New York the same evening, and, going directly to Greeley's office, conveyed the result of his interview. When he had finished Greeley asked, in his high-keyed tone, "Hoskins, do you believe that lie?" The latter asserted his belief that Mr. Lincoln would do exactly what he had promised. "I don't," retorted Greeley. Hoskins said, "I will stake my life upon it." Thereafter Greeley remained silent, his eyes fixed on the floor as if in deep thought, and Hoskins quietly retired. The next morning The Tribune blew the long-wished-for blast that ended its languishing campaign. An editorial, nearly two columns in length, closed as follows (Sept. 6, 1864):

"Henceforth, we fly the banner of Abraham Lincoln for the next President. • • •"

Hoskins, later elected Speaker of the New York Assembly, often saw Greeley. It was after the President's re-election, on the terrible 14th of April, that Hoskins and Greeley met, and, according to this biography,

• • • the editor, referring to the fact that the Cabinet had not been reconstructed or himself in any way recognized, burst out with:

"Hoskins, didn't I tell you that was a lie?"

Hoskins promised to run over to Washington that night and see what the trouble was. As he stepped out of the sleeper on the morning of the 15th he heard the clarion cry of a newsboy: "The President is assassinated! The President is dead!"

Whatever his doubts, from the time of his "conversion" Greeley publicly supported Lincoln for re-election and continued in louder praise after the assassination. Exasperated, petulant, nerve-wracked Greeley may have been; but he was always an aboveboard enemy, and as an editor leaned backward to protect the freedom of his opinions. The Civil War reader, therefore, cannot fail to turn from this episode with two reflections. The first is that Greeley did not, and could not by nature, come to a right-about merely because he heard that Lincoln intended to make him Postmaster General. The second is that Lincoln did not, and could not by nature, make dishonest promises for the sake of swinging Greeley into line. Neither action runs true to form. To put it on no higher grounds, Lincoln was too shrewd. Finally, it is quite possible that the assassin's bullet cut short Lincoln's intentions—or lack of them—as chronicled by Mr. Alexander; and that the epithet of "liar," if necessary at all, should be applied to other persons than either Lincoln or Greeley.

Mr. Seitz, a past master in character drawing, gives a crisp picture of the irascible yet lovable old editor. With journalistic impatience the author summarizes, in the opening chapter, the same method which he followed so successfully in his life of Joseph Pulitzer:

This was a mild-mannered, baby-faced personage who was to break shackles, wreck parties and do as much as any one person to bring on civil war. No stranger looking figure appeared among the noted men of his day. He was rather tall in stature, five feet ten and a half, with a frame badly set and a large, queer-shaped head. It was round as a ball. The forehead bulged, betokening brain power behind it, while on the edge of the dome the blue eyes gazed unblinkingly at mankind. The eyes had no sparkle, indeed were mild and pale. The complexion was white—so white as to be startling, though there was nothing unhealthy in the pallor.

The book is naturally a cross-section of American history in the middle of the nineteenth century, when the burning questions of secession and slavery were at stake. Greeley was not an office editor, much less a business editor of the modern type. He covered all outdoors; lectured, spoke, was a voice at conventions as reporter or delegate, a literary adviser and churchgoer. He started as a printer, and of his predilections for printers there is many an anecdote.

One's affection for Greeley grows with an understanding of his domestic life, a subject accurately and sympathetically handled by the author. The lifelong union with Mary Cheney Greeley, his wisp of a school teacher wife, was imperfectly happy; and, although neither separation nor scandal was even insinuated, Greeley found at home about as much peace of mind as did Thackeray or Carlyle or Lincoln—or, in fact, any man of powerful individuality united to a partner of equal spirit. The worst of it was that they loved one another devotedly. If the fact made matters harder it also developed in Greeley a singular forbearance which he did not show in his public relations.

During his early post-marriage days Greeley was busy editor of The New Yorker, grandparent in name but not in tone of our present journal; and at that time things went smoothly enough in the household. But the dark-haired little bride had gone in for fads. She brought up the children on the "Graham" system, and she was a poor housekeeper to boot. On the eldest son, Arthur Young Greeley, disguised as "Pickey," the wife lavished affection. He was made an experiment in pure skin and pure digestion; his habits in bathing, dress and even toys were peculiar, with the result that the precocious plant came to an untimely end. Darling "Pickey" died at the age of 5. Two other infants died at birth. Mary Ines died at 6 months and Raphael at 6 years. Only two out of seven survived. In the mother the outcome was an almost insane melancholia—which in her humdrum life of four walls she could not overcome—and a shrewish tongue which, according to the few visitors of later days, seemed to roll over her husband without leaving a mark. Better than others he knew her sufferings, and he knew that his own life was too crowded for an attempt to beguile her with distractions. One can forgive some of the extravagance of Greeley's public utterance when looking behind scenes at its inception. For example, one day a Washington man called at the Greeley home in Nineteenth Street seeking to engage the editor for a lecture. The following choice scene ensued:

I rang loud and repeatedly, and at last a lady came down with sleeves tucked briskly up her arms and her hair twisted into a knot on top of her head.

"Is Mr. Greeley in?"

"He is not."

"Do you know where he is?"

"I do not. He is not stopping here now."

"Can I see Mrs. Greeley?"

"You can. I am Mrs. Greeley."

"Do—was—is—does Mr. Greeley come home sometimes?"

"Occasionally. He has not come home this week."

"Do you know where he is stopping?"

"I do not. He stopped at the Everett House last week."

I went down to that hotel and inquired. They said he was at the New York Hotel, and there I found him raging up and down his room and storming over a pile of dispatches on the table. I seemed de trop and inquired what was the matter.

"Matter?" he repeated in his high falsetto. "Enough, I should think. Battle yesterday at Pittsburg Landing; rebels whipped us, of course. Our soldiers are being driven into Tennessee today. Our generals are drunk. Buell ought to be shot and Grant ought to be hung!"

After a while he calmed down sufficiently to enable me to state my errand and take my leave.

One can also understand Greeley's outbursts and his despondency, brought on by sleepless nights—the "two or three hours at the most" of which he so frequently complained. He seemed always on the verge of a breakdown. Possibly the restraint of tongue at home was the reverse shield of his garrulousness abroad; for short of pen or speech he could not be. On the stump he was renowned as a magazine of facts, and he often refused invitations for short speeches. "I can't make a pyrotechnic ten-minute speech," he wrote to William H. Seward's biographer in refusal of a Fourth of July invitation. "I can't say anything worth while unless I have time to say it in my own way."

The robust editor's finale is no exception to the generality that careers of the great often end in despair. Early in 1872 he was near the pinnacle of fame. He had been nominated to run against Grant. But the State elections went against his party, and it was soon apparent that a large majority was to roll against him on the first Tuesday in November. The curtain-raiser of this drama was one of private grief: for Mrs. Greeley died in her husband's arms five days before the election. On Nov. 6 The Tribune announced its editor's defeat for the Presidency. On Nov. 8 appeared Greeley's last contribution to the page he had loved so well. During that time the office conspiracy—in reality a sale of stock to interests inimical to Greeley—had already been completed. In one short week he had lost a wife, the highest office in the land and his beloved Tribune. The triple blow snapped the harness of a brain already disordered. He lingered long enough to write, "My sorrows do not come single files, but in battalions." He was committed to a private "establishment" at Pleasantville, N. Y. Less than three weeks later, at the comparatively early age of 61, Horace Greeley died and was buried in Greenwood Cemetery, Brooklyn.

What Are You Going to Do About It if "Old Honesty" Lets Him Loose Again?

A Quarter Century In French Letters

PARIS.

VINGT-CINQ ans de littérature française" (Twenty-five Years of French Literature) consists of two thick quarto volumes with innumerable portraits, drawings and autographs, published under the editorship of Eugène Montfort. He was assisted by a number of collaborators: Paul Reichmann, Pierre Lasserre, Pierre Lièvre, Jean Bonnerot, André Billy, Louis Latzarus and others. These great collective works are fashionable now. The same method was used by Petit de Julleville in his "History of French Literature," by Lavisse in his "History of France" and "Contemporary History," and before them by the Benedictines.

The twenty-five years of literature studied in this enormous work go from 1895 to 1920. It was in 1895 that Eugène Montfort, aged 18 and just out of college, made his bow. Without losing a moment he immediately founded a literary school, the naturalist school, together with some friends—Saint-Georges de Bouhélier, Michel Abadie, Marc Largue, Maurice Le Blond and some others. Most of the naturalists were young poets who unfortunately neglected the formality of writing masterpieces. M. Eugène Montfort was the two-fold exception, being a prose writer and a very successful one. He has published some novels that fairly pulse with life and are written in a brilliant and limpid style. He is a descendant of Maupassant, whom he calls "the inimitable one." It is evident that naturalism and the year 1895 are especially full of youthful memories for M. Eugène Montfort, but do not bear the same significance for everybody. Not only as the naturalist school failed to produce epoch-making poetic works, but its theories lacked both novelty and precision. They were summed up in an exaltation of nature and life, a grandiloquent realism and an optimism as vague as it was humanitarian.

SAY what you will, this naturalism exercised no influence whatever and passed almost unnoticed. As far as poetry is concerned 1895 is not a significant date. True, Verlaine died early in 1896; but that other master of symbolism, Mallarmé, still lived and had many disciples. Even to the present day the majority of noteworthy French poets have their roots in symbolism: Henri de Régnier, Vielé-Griffin, Paul Claudel, Francis Jammes and Paul Valéry himself, the greatest of them all, at the zenith of his glory today, who only recently was elected to the French Academy to take the chair of Anatole France. There was only one serious split, and that not in 1895, but in 1891, when Moréas founded the Romance school, together with Raymond de la Tailhède, Maurice du Plessys, Hugues Rebell and Ernest Raymond. Yet it can be maintained that a great deal of symbolism remained in the excellent works of the poets of the Romance school, despite the improvements and corrections they considered necessary. Mme. de Noailles, who came later, is a purely spontaneous poet, Greek and pagan on her mother's side, and does not owe much to any school.

Where the novel, which is of particular interest to Eugène Montfort, is concerned, it is more logical to commence the study of a literary period in 1895. Zola, Edmond de Goncourt and Alphonse Daudet were still alive, but not for long, and their work was practically finished. Maupassant was dead. The naturalist era was over, although it kept such of the faithful as Huysmans, Rosny, Mirbeau; however, these modified the doctrine on certain points. In "A rebours" Huysmans even played a prominent part in the history of symbolism, as a theoretician; Mallarmé recognized this by entitling one of his most beautiful and most obscure poems "Prose for Des Esseintes." (You remember that Des Esseintes is the hero of "A rebours" and defends the new esthetics.)

IN the chapter on the novel from 1895 to 1920, edited by Eugène Montfort himself, there are brilliantly clever studies on Anatole France, Maurice Barrès, Paul Adam, Charles-Louis Philippe, &c. But M. Montfort displays rather too much hostility toward André Gide and absolute unfairness toward Marcel Proust. The chapter on philosophy, in charge of Pierre Lasserre, treats competently and lucidly of Boutroux, Bergson, Henri Poincaré, Meyerson, Durckheim and the psychologists (Th. Ribot, Pierre Janet, Georges Dumas). I call your attention also to the chapter on journalists, by M. Louis Latzarus; on the development of the language and of style, by M. Pierre Lièvre, and on the literature of women, by Mme. Henriette Charasson. There are many others besides. On the whole, though some opinions could be disputed, the entire work presents impossibly complete documentation. We must only remember that most of the authors mentioned have continued writing since 1920, although the scope of the work does not go beyond that date, so that their later writings are not mentioned.

Eugène Marsan has published an "Eloge de la Paresse" (In Praise of Idleness), as part of the piquant series that smilingly sings the paradoxical praises of various faults, and in which there have appeared M. Abel Hermant's eulogy of "Gossip," M. Gérard Bauër's praise of "Disorder," André Beaumier's commendation of "Frivolity," &c. M. Eugène Marsan distinguishes between that which the Latins called pigritia and that which they named otium or otia. The former means the heavy, stupefying inertia of soft, weak-willed creatures. M. Eugène Marsan admits the thlessness of this variety. But leisure, the idleness of the clever man, occupies itself freely with numberless choice and pleasant subjects. As for the man of genius—he frequently makes his greatest discoveries while apparently doing nothing; for example, Newton, who, lying at his ease under an apple tree, suddenly was struck by the idea of universal gravity. And what can we say of the poets, who constantly work as they dream?

There is announced a new book of M. Romain Rolland, "Pâques fleuries" (Easter Flowers); a collection of six posthumous tales of Emile Verhaeren, "Le travailleur étrange" (The Strange Worker), and some "Cahiers Paul Valéry" (Notes on Paul Valéry), in which are promised essays by M. Lewinson, the Rev. Father Gillet, M. Frédéric Lefèvre and several others, including the writer of this article. PAUL SOUDAY.

Michael Collins Led A Fighting Life

LONDON.

THE biography of Michael Collins by his old comrade in arms Pierce Beasley (disguised on the title page as Piaras Beaslai) was eagerly awaited for its promised revelations of the methods of the intelligence service that so often got the better of Dublin Castle, and of the negotiations with the British Prime Minister that ultimately resulted in the signing of the treaty. In these respects it is not disappointing. As a "thriller" it knocks most novels of adventure into a cocked hat. It seems to be less successful as a portrait of the hero himself. Stephen Gwynn's criticism of it is that its value is historical, and that as a biography it fails. While it makes us feel Collins's promptitude and resourcefulness, it does not convey a full sense of his magnanimity. And this is because the author himself lacks it. The life of a generous fighter, says Mr. Gwynn, should have been generously written, and this book is not. Very much the same conclusion is reached by Hugh Martin, an English journalist who was a good deal behind the scenes during the most troublous times in Ireland. He regrets especially that this book should be marred by "gross attacks on the memory of that tortured soul Erskine Childers." Another comment of Mr. Martin's is that it reveals Michael Collins as not only a soldier of romance, but a "fully furnished politician," who if he had lived would have cut a much more distinguished figure as a Dominion Premier than was ever possible as a guerrilla commandant.

According to The Irish Statesman, there is a prospect of our getting further light on this stormy period from another side, for Sir Alfred Cope—of whom it says that not even Michael Collins was more the mystery man of the revolution—is reported to be meditating a book on his Irish experiences. Sir Alfred's career has been a most dramatic one, and there is no one better qualified either to describe the inner life of Dublin Castle during the war years or to tell the story of the underground diplomacy that prepared the way for the truce negotiations.

THERE is nothing at all exciting in the announcement by the Cambridge University Press of a new book it is issuing for the University of Melbourne entitled "A Comparative Study of the Melanesian Island Languages," by Sidney Herbert Ray. But it covers what might be described as a romance of scholarship. Mr. Ray was originally a pupil and then a teacher at a public elementary school. His work lay in a populous working-class district on the outskirts of London. His ordinary duties in such a sphere must have made exhausting demands on his physical and mental energies. Nine people out of ten in such a position would be satisfied with keeping abreast of their daily time table. But young Ray, out of sheer love of learning, took up the study of the languages spoken in the islands of Oceania—a strange choice, especially as there was no prospect of his ever being able to visit that part of the world. He acquired such proficiency, however, that when the first anthropological expedition sent by Cambridge University to Torres Straits returned to England all the linguistic materials it had collected were placed in his hands. When the next expedition went out arrangements were made for him to accompany it. The publication of its reports led to his receiving an honorary Cambridge M. A. Since that time his various treatises on the languages of Borneo, Lifu, Papua, &c., have brought him recognition as the principal authority on these out-of-the-way tropics, and the volume now issued, which is pronounced to be the most important contribution to the subject since Dr. R. H. Codrington published his "Melanesian Languages" in 1885, may be regarded as the crown of a remarkable career.

MORE nonsense," says The Glasgow Herald, "has been written about Scott's poetry than about that of any other poet of our race, mainly because the personal element so characteristic of nineteenth-century poetry is almost absent from his work." . . . Women, according to E. H. Jeffs, are seldom good essayists. They do not lay open their minds in friendly candor as men do. They are too fond of keeping secrets. . . . In its review of David Knowles's "American Civil War" The Times Literary Supplement predicts that future generations will find the great man of that conflict not in Lee or Lincoln, but in Grant, the one man who, with the possible exception of Sherman, saw the war as a whole. . . . In "Scouting on Two Continents" Major F. R. Burnham not only relates his many adventures under Lord Roberts in the Transvaal war, but records his early experiences in America, where he learned his scoutcraft in service against the red Indians. . . . A selection of gypsy stories, "The Gypsy Patteran," is being edited by Joseph Ellner. . . . Sheila Kaye-Smith is breaking new ground by preparing a volume of "Plays and Poems." . . . G. K. Chesterton is bringing out a new volume of essays, "The Outline of Sanity." . . . J. Middleton Murry is now engaged on an important critical work on Shakespeare, which will probably run to three separate books. . . . There will shortly be issued the first of a series of "Mercury Books," to give permanent form to articles and poems which have appeared in The London Mercury. It will include contributions from Thomas Hardy, Robert Bridges, Sir Edmund Gosse and many other distinguished men of letters.

BERLIN.

THIS time Thomas Mann reveals his real personality and unfolds all the most charming sides of his being. His settling of accounts with Paris is by no means a bitter criticism—quite the reverse; it contains only a full expression of his gratitude for the friendly reception he was given by Parisian authors and artists on the occasion of a lecture. And, as we must expect of so keenly observant a spirit, the personal report of his trip is sprinkled with innumerable clever, finely pointed or ironical remarks on French and German culture, art, and social and culinary pleasures.

In his story "Chaos and Early Sorrow" it is the tender heart of the father that speaks. I have mentioned it before, this little tale of the lovingly intimate family life of the Manns, when it was published for the first time, in the Neue Rundschau. Now it has been put out very daintily by S. Fischer, with a wrapper and frontispiece etching by Karl Walser. The type is Bessemer italics, and it has been printed by Jakob Hegner of Hellerau. Besides, three hundred copies have been printed on handmade paper. This gem of heartfelt narrative art, merits such care; it is the ideal gift for a young mother, or for the woman one loves. Once before did Thomas Mann, this coolly ironical skeptic, raise the veil before the sanctuary of his heart, in his lovely "Song of the Little Child." There, in solemn hexameters, he chanted his love for his youngest little daughter. The present story, too, centres about this little girl, now 5 years old, who, more than all the other children, possesses the father's love in an almost marvelous and very touching way. In the course of a deliciously depicted gala day enhanced by herring salad, during the wretched inflation period, the child, abruptly taken out of the regular life of the nursery, is suddenly seized with an acute, uncontrollable passion for a young student who has danced with her for fun.

Those who see much of children know this precocious, innocently presentient first emotion of their little hearts, which passes over as quickly as the Spring breeze blows away cherry blossom petals. The next morning, therefore, tearful little Lorchen, beside whose bed her loving father sits helplessly, will awake from her peaceful sleep to find the old, inexhaustible, ever new joy in her rompings and merry games. A most simple, most natural matter, but set in the ornamental frame of a marvelously musical style, made radiant by a noble spirit. Albrecht Durer has a drawing that is an immortal work of art—a little bouquet of violets and delicate grasses. It is recalled by this tale of fair little Lorchen's early sorrow and of her father's love.

THOUGH he usually struggles with the serious problems of our time, Jakob Wassermann, too, brings us a Christmas offering of a lovely, fairy-like story of a boy endowed with the gift of poetry and a powerful imagination. Living in a dull-witted or viciously cruel environment, he gives strange raptures to old and young with his tales of the magic dream-world in his heart. But it is a time of murderous bloodthirstiness; witches and heretics are burning at the stake everywhere. So he, too, is accused of black magic; and because he is of noble birth, and the nephew of a bishop, he is granted the boon of death by the sword.

It requires Wassermann's great artistry to reveal the inner life of the poetic young boy so delicately and convincingly that, far removed from the world and its horrors, he has only an amazed, unbelieving smile for his executioner—until the torturing of his mother before his eyes plunges him into a deep swoon.

At the eleventh hour the beloved boy is rescued from the hands of his tormentors by thousands of the country's youth thronging to his aid. A beautiful symbol, the invariable victory of youth over the fanaticism, cruelty and stupidity of any age, the saving of its idols for a brighter future.

HANS FRIEDRICH BLUNCK delves ever more deeply into the myths of ancient times, raising them up with marvelous descriptive power to pulsing life, breathing into them the warm breath of his own heart. Inevitably, therefore, the sober men of our mechanistic age only stand agape before this incomprehensible phenomenon, but have even begun more generally to bow reverently before the great, genuinely German poet. In the life story of the skillful inventor and smith Veland, the Nordic Prometheus, who, conscious of the power of his spirit, rebels against the gods and must do penance as a martyr, Blunck has depicted the Bronze Age. His imaginative brain and skillful hands make a demi-god of man; but every step upward in the mastery of the earth and the skies is paid for with endless agony.

The subject of Blunck's new work is the first creation of the divine by man. The first forms of sacrifice and priesthood are dedicated to the moon and stars; for, surrounded by the gloom of night, man trembles before them, divining mysterious forces that rule his life and to which he submits in blind humility. But it is a sign of intellectual progress when, turning away from the worship of the stars of night, King Ull declares the sun, the giver of life, to be the master of all and the greatest deity ruling mankind. The war between the sun and moon worshippers lasts through the entire belligerent life of the old giant Ull; but at the end of his days he must see his daughter, the sun priestess, uniting in love with the young priest of the moon. Thereupon the hoary warrior goes into the stone grave that has long been prepared for him; a living man, he joins his dead wife and is seen no more by his people. The young couple unites the two cults of the stars; and this one great religion is the beginning of the series of divine beings that men have worshipped at various times and on various occasions.

ROBERT HOHLBAUM, too, has written the third and final novel of his trilogy, "The German Passion"; this volume describes the awakening of the German spirit that preceded the classic age. We see Lessing, the founders of the league of Goettingen poets, the vigorous, untamed figure of Bürger; and at the end the silhouette of Goethe appears on the horizon. Hohlbaum did not escape the danger of reproducing a series of living portraits from literary history. The hero—a member of the Moschewien family that loves, suffers, watches and observes throughout the three volumes—is too insignificant to hold the interest. Broadly conceived works, such as this "German Passion," usually become weaker rather than more powerful toward the end.

friend and housekeeper. So utterly irresistible was Jo, that all the men who were not already Sally Chase's devoted admirers promptly fell in love with her, her victims including Gordon Mackay, a young Scotsman temporarily in charge of the small white church on Cherry Square, and Dallas Hunt, tenor in the choir of Dr. Chase's church. The latter's too manifest admiration of Jo proved extremely disagreeable to Sally Chase's cousin and guest, Adelaide Sturgis, who made herself as unpleasant to Jo as she possibly could, which was very unpleasant indeed.

All difficulties are presently smoothed away to the almost complete satisfaction of the many quite notably virtuous people in the book. Mrs. O'Grady is sometimes mildly amusing, but the best drawn characters in the tale are those of the two old maids, Miss Clarinda and Miss Lucinda Hunt, whose windows overlooked the Cherry House gardens. In the beginning, one hopes that Miss Clarinda and Miss Lucinda are to have important parts in the narrative, but the roles assigned to them are of the slightest.

ALONE IN A BIG CITY

THE BLUE WINDOW. By Temple Bailey. 318 pp. Philadelphia: The Penn Publishing Company. $2.

IN substance, this novel is a simple problem in psychology. What will happen when a young girl who has been brought up among the hardships of a small country farm suddenly finds herself, after the death of her mother, thrust into the social life of a big city among people, environment and conditions diametrically opposite to all those she has ever known?

It offers possibilities to view individuals and groups, to study reactions and to probe into motives, but instead the author skips all this by lightly, barely touching the surface in her efforts to pound home her moral: wit, that a life of honest poverty with a steadfast husband is more to be desired than a life of greed and shallowness.

Miss Bailey's investigation of Maryland society is not a very pretty picture. The frivolous rich and those who are frivolous and not rich are pictured as selfish weaklings, seeking the paths of least resistance and corrupting their honor in their lust for money and the artificial pleasures it can buy. Mothers and fathers alike, are willing to sacrifice their daughters at the altar of any rich man, young or old, provided that as a result they can be saved from the dullness and drabness of poverty.

It is impossible to imagine anything more vapid. It smacks too much of theatricalism. The incidents are deliberately planned to produce a definite effect and the characters are shallow, mere outlines that soon fade from one's memory.

Instead of developing the drama, which is simple and affords opportunities, the author has crammed it with preposterous dialogue, shallow characters and artificial coincidences, and the result is a decidedly irritating tale that makes even its moral, which seems to have been uppermost in Miss Bailey's mind, lose all of its effect, if ever it had any.

BACON'S REBELLION

THE BRIGHT FACE OF DANGER. By C. M. Sublette. Illustrated by Rodney Thompson. 321 pp. Boston: An Atlantic Monthly Press publication. Little, Brown & Co. $3.

THIS is a historical adventure story set in the belligerent atmosphere of seventeenth-century Virginia at the time of Bacon's Rebellion. Despite the sponsorship of the Atlantic Monthly Press, it is not the type of book that one is accustomed to associate with that venerable journal. It is a rather bombastic, rough-and-tumble romance filled with hackneyed and banal situations.

Francis Havenell, self-possessed, courageous and impetuous, having spent half a dozen years with the English Army on the Continent, is preparing to return to his father's plantation in Virginia when he learns that his best friend has been murdered in a fake duel. At almost the same time he receives the news of the mysterious murder of his father. He vows to dedicate his life to avenging these deaths and leaves immediately for America. There he quickly becomes embroiled in the struggle between the frontier planters and the Governor. He joins an unofficial expedition against marauding Indians and is, with his companions, proclaimed a rebel.

There follows a long and rather interesting description of Bacon's famous rebellion against the authority of the English King. The author sums up with historical accuracy the grievances of the Colonists, and portrays vividly the rebuffs which they met when they sought relief.

As a historical novel "The Bright Face of Danger" rarely rises above a third-rate average, but it is distinctly superior to the usual cheap adventure story. There is some slight attempt at characterization, and the melodrama is not at any time allowed actually to become objectionable.

Europe Since 1815

An interesting thing, though not wholly new, is Dr. Davis's remark that Marshal MacMahon was "the one fairly competent General" France had in 1870. France, smarting under the pitiful record made by her Marshals, let the rank lie fallow after that until some one should demonstrate that he would not degrade the names of Ney, Soult and Macdonald by wearing it. Then she conferred it on Joffre and afterward on others.

Powerfully does Dr. Davis prove that the World War was won by Britain's control of the sea. It was not merely that England could outshoot the Germany Navy. By her control of the sea she was able to bring the Dominions into the war and provide the Allies with munitions. She forced the Germans into those marine outrages which brought America into the conflict and ended the war. "If at any moment British sea power had failed the whole grand alliance against Germany would have collapsed suddenly. But British sea power did not fail."

Up to 1848 European history was a poor shambling thing, and may, for all we can tell, be dismissed in a paragraph when the future historian comes to write of it. Alexander and his Holy Alliance seemed to have everything their own way; they remind one of John Hay's "nigger squat on the safety valve." France was the first to explode, and Czar Nicholas dashed into a ball at the Winter Palace shouting, "Saddle your horses, gentlemen! France is a republic!" Immediately afterward all Europe seethed, though why Dr. Davis does not say more about Ireland I do not understand. It was at least as interesting as Bavaria; and I think, in writing of Bavaria, he might have paid more attention to the cleverest statesman there, Lola Montes, though maybe he does not share the Jesuits' opinion of her influence.

"The Kings and the rulers came back" in 1849, as Walt Whitman said, and universal and eternal peace was celebrated under the auspices of that amiable gosling, Prince Albert, in London. Then broke out the "useless" war over Nicholas's sick man in the Crimea, and there followed the sensible efforts of Cavour and Bismarck to "make" (Cavour's word) Italy and Germany. Europe was again awake, aroused and doing. The wars lasted until 1871, with Napoleon III very busy and impressing himself on the nations as the principal figure. He was not. Cavour and Bismarck were. The incidents, such as the destruction of the Pope's temporal power, were part of the work. After Victor Emmanuel established Italy in 1870 and Bismarck created the German Empire in the Hall of Mirrors in 1871, with Favre and Thiers mourning the apparent death of France, Europe settled busily to the work of stabilization. Things like Ferry's colonial adventures were idle side issues and need not concern us. But a new phase began when Germany, swollen with pride, undertook to meet Britain on the sea and in the colonies. The result was the great explosion of 1914.

This is sketchy, but the best that can be done in a few columns with a great and masterly work. Dr. Davis's task was tremendous, but he has fulfilled it wonderfully.

Milburne's country estate. He waits there several days while his ankle is healing.

The two men soon become intimate, and Milburne, who comes from unimaginative, Calvinistic stock, finally tells Sir Edward about a certain dream that has worried him greatly. Since early childhood a certain dream has been repeated once each year upon a certain day at Easter time. It is that he is in a large, awesome room off which opens a long line of similar rooms, at the end of which is a mysterious door that is always shut. Each year there is one less room between him and the door. He is positive that when the door finally opens the great trial of his life will come.

In the next eight years the two men become the most intimate of friends; they both perform great feats in the war and come out of it without serious injury. At a hunting party one Autumn after the war they met an ill-mannered young flapper named Koré Arabin, whose father and grandfather, both eccentric and brilliant English noblemen, lived upon an island off the coast of Greece which the first Arabin had bought. Koré's father had the reputation of being the cruelest and most diabolic man in Europe. He gathered about him upon his island a collection of brilliant perverts who indulged in all manner of viciousness. The superstitious natives accused them of being masters of black magic, and various other rumors were rife. Koré's father had died a short time before she appeared in the story. She had been brought up upon the Continent, hated the name of her father, but felt herself responsible for undoing the wrong that he had done. Both Milburne and Leithen disliked her intensely upon first meeting her.

Naturally, these two incongruous groups meet upon the mysterious island. Sir Edward, through some legal business, becomes entangled in Koré's affairs, gets to like her, and finally falls half in love with her. Milburne finds the fulfillment of his dream in some terrifying pagan rites that take place around Koré's house. And Koré, with the aid of these two, succeeds in expiating, in part, the sins of her father. The end of the story is filled with scenes of real dramatic power. Neither the romance nor the melodrama ever becomes offensive.

A WASTED LIFE

TENTACLES.* By Martha Kinross. 286 pp. New York: Harper & Bros. $2.

"TENTACLES" is the story of a young girl, not over strong in will, who lets her chances for life glide from her to take care of a selfish drag-weight of a mother. Somehow or other entwined with this major plot runs the romance of a woman-writer and a war-hero essayist that fares happily in the end. This secondary romance is psychologically a little misty, but it serves to accentuate the tragedy of a wasted life. It throws the main theme of the book into bolder relief.

The mother-daughter problem is not new to fiction. It has been considered with more complete documentation in "Mary Olivier." But the method of Martha Kinross is not that of May Sinclair; in place of the staccato "stream of consciousness," we have in "Tentacles" the old, free objective method of "getting at" character. We have a group of people placed in and about the villa of Fanny Calverly, near Florence. The author simply tells what happens to them all, how they react to one another. And every now and then she spices the whole with a wise, arresting commentary of her own.

This comment, coming as it does in bursts of whimsical epigram, saves the book from the commonplace. Listen to Miss Kinross on spinsters in a pension:

"* * * they get hold of a crumb of gossip" and "snatch it out of one another's mouths like goldfish in a fountain."

Consider this thrust at people who vaunt their most unavoidable virtues:

"How many of us would stick to duty if poverty were not the easement!"

At characterization Miss Kinross is more often adept than otherwise. Mrs. Warley, the mother who draws the life blood from her daughter, is scathingly portrayed. She is witless and a custodian of some mythical "British virtue." She despises Italians because they do not speak the English language. She makes a religion of her impotencies and nags for the sake of nagging. In return for bringing a daughter into the world (something, as Miss Kinross suggests, any female animal can do) she demands the lifelong devotion of that unhappy child. Evelyn, the daughter, is also fully realized. She has the intelligence to be fully aware of her predicament, but lacks the strength to cut the ties.

The writing in "Tentacles" is often beautiful. Miss Kinross has a knack for color which she never, in the phrase of the copy reader, "lays on with a trowel."

IN THE MIDDLE AGES

THE DANCER AND THE FRIAR.* By Eugene Paul Metour. New York: George H. Doran Co. $2.50.

BEGINNING with the days when Richard the Lion-Hearted, a boy of 15, came with Eleanor of Acquitaine, his mother, to the castle of the Lords of Baux in Provence, and ending with the surrender of Jerusalem to the victorious Saladin, Eugene Paul Metour's long novel is a kind of pageant of the Middle Ages, passing in review their squalor and their splendor. France and Egypt, Syria, the Red Sea and the Mediterranean are all traversed in the course of the book's all but 400 closely printed pages, while the intrigues of Guy de Lusignan, Renaud de Chatillon, Raymond de Tripoli and the Bishop of Tyre, the quarrels and treacheries of the various factions struggling together for control of "the abode of iniquity which Western nations knew as the Holy Land," help to make the plot so complicated that it is not always easy to follow. The author is at his best when describing the scenes and personages of the times; not when relating the adventures and analyzing the emotions of his hero and heroine.

The author shows the degradation and filth of the times, and shows, too, something of its wanton cruelty, cruelty well illustrated by the fate of those wretched female captives, whose "agonizing yells were met by the fiendish laughter of the Spanish archers." Saladin himself appears in these pages, a conqueror who reminded his emissary that when the Christians made themselves masters of Jerusalem "they slaughtered the Moslems until the blood of the martyrs rose to the bridles of their horses, and they made a shambles of the mosque of Omar," an example he had no wish to imitate. There is plenty of fighting, culminating in the battle of Hattin, at whose close Saladin prepared to lay siege to Jerusalem, as well as graphic accounts of the daily life of the time. "The Dancer and the Friar" is a finely wrought chronicle of the Middle Ages.

A FASCINATING WAITRESS

GRACE S. RICHMOND'S simple and innocuous, if rather slowly moving, little story has most of its action placed in and about the old Cherry House on Cherry Square in the village of Cherry Hills, a quiet little town about eleven miles from Stamford. The house had been in the Cherry family for generations, and when old Miss Eldora Cherry died she left it to her niece, Sally, otherwise Mrs. Schuyler Chase, wife of the minister of a great New York church. For two years the old house remained untenanted, but when Sally's husband went to Europe for a much-needed vacation, Sally brought her three children, nurse and cook to spend the Summer at Cherry Hills. She did not bring a waitress, and thanks to energetic Norah O'Grady, who went out by the day, that position was presently filled by pretty, well-bred Josephine Jenney, graduate of a famous women's college, and for the past months teacher in the little Cherry Hills school.

Josephine, usually called Jo, had reasons of her own for wishing to spend the Summer at Cherry Hills. She made up her mind to be a "fascinating servant" and carried out her intention so successfully that Sally Chase was greatly attracted to her, took her to church, and soon promoted her to the position of EUROPE SINCE WATERLOO.* By William Stearns Davis. 963 pp. New York: The Century Company. $6.

By CHARLES WILLIS THOMPSON

WE doubt not through the ages, or at least through the nineteenth century, one increasing purpose ran.

There was one far-off, not divine event, toward which the whole creation moved. But it would be doing Dr. Davis an injustice to intimate that his is that cheap wisdom after the event which makes everything tributary to the great thing which happened at the end of it. For instance, the writers on American history make it appear that nobody was talking about anything except slavery until 1860, when in fact it was almost the least of their concerns, so that the abolitionist Whittier broke out despairingly and unpoetically, "Tell me not of banks and tariffs." Rising on stepping-stones of our dead selves to higher things, nobody can write the history of France without making it tend to the French Revolution, and nobody can write the history of the ancient world without bending all its movements toward the Crucifixion.

Dr. Davis is so free from this that the aimless, higgledy-piggledy politics of the nineteenth century have never been so well described, and "never" is a large word. He quotes the forgotten statesman who said, after the fall of Napoleon, "We are now in the day of small things and little men"; he reveals in quoting Metternich's hopeful forecast, "The happiest result [of the Congress of Vienna] is that there is to be no change in the existing order of things," and "The basis of modern policy is, and must be, repose." It wasn't, but its disturbances lacked apparent purpose, and in 1870 Sir Robert Morier discovered that the Crimean War was "the only perfectly useless modern war which has been waged." It was concerning that war that Lord Salisbury made his historic remark that "England put her money on the wrong horse," a pictorial description of the helter-skelter way in which politics was conducted. Nobody had any vision. Gladstone least of all, and Bismarck and Metternich did not see very far.

And yet events were shaping themselves blunderingly toward the World War. After Waterloo, or rather after the Congress of Vienna, Europe was left a shattered congeries of wandering nations without any special object, except that Alexander I and Metternich wanted peace, which revolution after revolution ought to have shown them was not written in the heavens. The almost accidental way in which European politics was shaped is shown in Czar Nicholas's remark that Turkey was a sick man and his estate ought to be looked after before he died. Apparently Nicholas had not thought much about that until a few years before he said it, but England's amazed refusal to entertain the idea brought on the "useless" Crimean War. The adventures of Napoleon III, too, though they seemed to be well thought out at the time, have a happy-go-lucky aspect now that they are looked back upon.

The things that led up to the World War were the unification of Italy, the unification of Germany, the degradation of Austria in 1866 and Germany's silly attempt to isolate England. In all I have written so far I have tried to interpret Dr. Davis, and hope I have not done him any injustice, for his book is colossal. At the same time it is thrilling reading; it will not let you go. It is not possible to compress it, yet that is what I must do, well or ill, in a few columns. If I misinterpret this truly great history I beg the author's pardon. For truly great it is. The history of that period and the lessons of the present have been swayed by many, with confusion as the result.

His method is novel. It is not chronological. He does not leave a subject until he has exhausted it, and then turns to another, so that you may leave 1870 and find 1820 on the next page. You may think this will be confusing, but it brings about a clearness that has always been lacking in the chronological histories. Everything is grouped. Further, though he is a scholar, he has a rushing and engrossing style. It is often said, and Dr. Davis himself repeats it, that the history of this period cannot be really written for a century or so; we are too near it. Hume brought his History of England to an end with the reign of James II for the same reason, and even Green did not dare go further than the Napoleonic wars. But Dr. Davis's work ought to be standard until that future history is written. We do not see how anybody in our time or for fifty years to come can better it. Certainly no one, even in that remote future, can better it in the mere matter of style, though he is not purple or even red.

He does skimp some parts of the record, but he is right in doing it. He slights the period after the fall of Napoleon, but who will ever be interested in that period in perspective? The revolution of July, the Carlist rebellion, Metternich's intrigues, the German rebellion or unrest of the '30s, what are they in the long run of history? I think he is a little bit blamable for devoting so much space even to the Crimean War, though it had this important result—that it was the first blow in the face Russia ever received, and so had important results, in spite of what Morier said.

Nobody has summarized the World War so fully and fairly. He is with Harden in regarding Hindenburg as a wood signpost, with Ludendorff the real hero. His sympathies are with the English, but he finds no heroes there, nor in America. The English hero is the common man. He does admire Foch intensely and he gives Nivelle the credit that hitherto has been withheld from him. Nivelle had "with great cleverness recovered some of the most important positions won by the Germans around Verdun," no slight thing, for which nobody but Pétain has got much honor. That was why he was appointed to make the disastrous drive of 1917.

Dr. Davis makes Napoleon III the most important figure of the century, which is just and right, though the historian does not conceal his contempt for the "dubious adventurer," as he calls him. Indeed, he heads one chapter with Victor Hugo's blasting nickname, "Napoleon the Little," which is not quite fair. Charles Louis was only "little" by comparison with his gigantic uncle. But, pinchbeck or not, he occupied the whole attention of Europe from 1848 to 1870, and no other man did that, though there were Alexanders, Nicholases, Franz Josefs, Metternichs, Palmerstons, and even Bismarcks.

Then, too, Charles Louis Napoleon Bonaparte nearly always got away with it. His bungling in Italy was not known at the time, and the only conspicuous failure of his rule was his foray into Mexico. Thiers summed him up acutely in a sentence which Dr. Davis quotes: "The French committed two mistakes about Louis Napoleon—the first when they took him for a fool, the second when they took him for a man of genius." He was not responsible for the downfall of 1870, which was mainly Gramont's fault.

On that point Dr. Davis gives a most graphic and dramatic account of the so-called Ems forgery. Bismarck did not forge that telegram. The whole story is another example of the haphazard way in which the politics of the nineteenth century was conducted. Bismarck's conduct, of course, was disgraceful, but it was not forgery. He was dining in Berlin with Moltke and Roon. All three wanted war, but King William did not. "The three were moody and distressed. Prussia had apparently recoiled before France, and all the world knew it."

Just then came William's telegram stating the case between Prussia and France, not in the least provocative. He left it to Bismarck whether to give it to Napoleon's emissary, Benedetti, or not. It was Bismarck's opportunity. He did not forge the dispatch, but he struck out a word here and put in one there until it sounded violent and sneering. Moltke and Roon roared their approval. "Before it sounded like a parley," cried Moltke, "now it is a defiance!" France was pushed on by Gramont and Ollivier against Napoleon's wishes, declared war and fell; the German Empire was created and Bismarck made William its first Emperor, and so the world started on its course toward Serajevo, the Marne, the Argonne and Scapa Flow. Bismarck, it should be noted, was a man of peace except where war would help to build up a unified Germany. He was no Treitschke, no Bernhardi.

The last-named figures and all the others of the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries who cut any figure are fully treated in this book. His analysis of Edward VII is particularly searching. Under his hand Edward becomes even more of a statesman than he has been thought, and he even hints that things might have taken a different turn, for England at least, if that wise man had lived until 1914. He thinks King George did not have the same comprehension. It is so rare nowadays that kings are statesmen that Edward stands out. Mostly they are the tools of Prime Ministers; but Edward was wiser than Salisbury and vastly wiser than the much-lauded Gladstone, who could not see beyond the end of his nose. This is not what Dr. Davis says; but read Thiers, the equally vaunted Disraeli was no better, except in the matter of the Suez Canal. Please don't remind me that they were not Edward's Ministers; but he must have ground his teeth in impotent rage to see the mess they were making of things. "George, be King," said his mother to George III; but Victoria was not Queen. England had to wait for Edward VII to have a King who was wiser than his Ministers in any such sense as Henry VIII was.

Gautier Symbolizes the Course Of French Romanticism

Mr. Palache's Enticing Chronicle Skims the Surface of an Absurd but Fruitful Movement

AUTIER AND THE ROMANTICS. By John Garber Palache. 186 pp. New York: The Viking Press. $2.*

"T would take a great artist to compress the essence of the French romantics into a book of no more than a hundred and eighty pages. John Garber Pa-che is neither a great artist nor a eat critic, and therefore his "Gau-r and the Romantics" does no ore than hint agreeably and in-nately enough at the achieve-ents, monstrosities and phenom-a of that era in French letters at was ushered in by the première Hugo's "Hernani." The very heme of the commentator's volume ade it necessary for him to write he ran, so to speak. He had so uch material with which to deal, o endless a procession of anecdotes, ersonal sidelights, critical gestures nd so overwhelming a conflict that e could do no more than bound, like Rocky Mountain goat, from crag o crag. This necessity, perforce, re-ults in a volume that does not hang ogether with any perceptible degree f coherency in spite of the fact that he central thread of interest is héophile Gautier and that most of he figures contemporary with Gau-ier are presented as in relation to im. Yet, in spite of this, "Gautier nd the Romantics" is an extraordi-arily enticing book, compact with musing anecdotes and indubitably erviceable to the reader who de-ires to orientate the French ro-antics in their proper milieu. Con-tant flashes of one of the most musing and exotic periods in lit-rary history are revealed, and these re witnessed against a good, round nowledge of French letters. Mr. alache, it is to be suspected, re-tricted himself too much as to space nd critical development in this ook. He should not have done this, or there is a decided vacancy on English book shelves for such a work s "Gautier and the Romantics" uggests and provides, in fact, an outline.

Two portraits of Théophile Gautier ay serve as the opening and clos-ng words on this period. The first f them reveals the French author n the opening night of Victor Hugo's "Hernani," namely, Feb. 25, 830. "With the rose-colored waist-oat Gautier wore light gray trousers ith bands of black velvet down the eams. Under his broad hat his long air hung down below his shoulders. His handsome face, pale and rather solemn, gave him a majestic appearance; and, according to the Goncourts, he looked like a lazy lion." It was so that Romanticism (the capital R might as well be used) was ushered in. And now for the second portrait, the year being 1871 (forty-one years after the Phoenix soared into French letters clad in its rose-colored waistcoat) and the narrator being the elder Goncourt.

The attic in which I found him [Gautier] with his two old sisters in dismal old clothes, was filled with the smoke of his cigar. There was an iron bed, a worn arm-chair and other meager furnishings and boarders, including the most famished-looking cats. Théo wore a red cap, an old velvet waistcoat with which he had formerly adorned himself at the Princesse Mathilde's, and which had acquired so many greasy spots that it might have belonged to a Neapolitan cook. And there sat the sick master of the art of writing and of conversation, looking like a Doge in distress, like a poor and melancholy Marino Faliero, acted at the Théâtre Saint-Michel. While he talked as Rabelais must have talked, I thought of the inadequacy of compensation for a life devoted to art; and, by comparison with the fate of Gautier, of the seventy-thousand-francs-per-year of one Ponson de Terrail, whose sumptuous and tasteless belongings I had seen removed from his house that morning, after his death.

It is between these two portraits, in point of time, that the scheme of Mr. Palache's book runs, and when it is noted that this implies considerations and personal pen sketches of Victor Hugo, Sainte-Beuve, George Sand, Baudelaire, Flaubert, Balzac, Dumas père, Edmond and Jules Goncourt, Leconte de Lisle, Prosper Mérimée, and the frequent mention of a host of subsidiary figures, it will be realized how much material the author is supposed to cover. In other words, he sets out to map the entire romantic movement in France.

He uses the term Romanticism in its broader sense, and this is quite justifiable. Balzac or Baudelaire, for instance, cannot—speaking strictly—be classified as Romantics. But, for Mr. Palache's purpose, Romanticism means the "exuberant revolt from the narrowest restraints which the doctrines of the seventeenth century had imposed." "Romanticism was not born in France," declared the Goncourts. "It was to come to us like a tropical plant from the new world. Bernardin de Sainte-Pierre imported it from Mauritius, and Chateaubriand from America." Mr. Palache points out that its roots were deep in the soil of France and that its great originator was Jean-Jacques Rousseau. He was the grandfather of Romanticism as Chateaubriand was the father. The children proved to be a mad and unbelievable horde constantly turning to the exotic Orient or indulging in the profoundest melancholy. As they pass swiftly through the pages of Mr. Palache's book the reader gathers a fairly vivid impression of each one.

Eccentricities marked them out. Many of them wore Spanish mantillas or pointed doublets. Haircuts were regarded as vulgar. Petrus Borel strolled the streets of Paris with his hat over one eye and his cloak hung from a shoulder Spanish style. Celestin Nanteuil wore armor and felt at home only in a medieval atmosphere. Gerard de Nerval was clapped into an insane asylum for leading a lobster by a string before the Palais Royal. "Why is a pet lobster any more absurd than a cat, dog, gazelle, lion or any other creature?" he protested. "Lobsters are quiet and serious; they neither bark nor bite, and they know the deepest secrets of the sea." Baudelaire dyed his hair green. Gautier reported for his military duty garmented in gray trousers, yellow waistcoat set with blue flowers, a green dress-coat with gold buttons, a rose-colored necktie, a soft collar, a policeman's cap, and carrying an ancient musket which he had borrowed from a collector. Yet, after all, it was from this group of men that such works came as "Mademoiselle de Maupin," "Les Fleurs du Mal" and "Madame Bovary."

Time has given Gautier a lesser place in the hierarchy of French authors of the nineteenth century than Balzac, or Flaubert, or Baudelaire, and Time is, strictly speaking, correct as usual. But the importance of Gautier must not be understated. He was a vital force in his day and it is true that both Flaubert and Baudelaire regarded him as an elder figure and a man to whom they might turn for advice. A great virility animated him. Mr. Palache indicates this well enough. Gautier was an older man than his greater contemporaries and he possessed a flexible and somewhat catholic critical appreciation. His broad humor, his wit, his activity, his air of self-possession and his experience gave him a dominating place in the literary society of his day. He was one of the first and the most striking of the art-for-art's-sake exponents and his overrated introduction to "Mademoiselle de Maupin" pitched him into the vanguard of those who were fighting so fiercely against the old binding rules of the seventeenth century. His works, as they exist today, may be old stories now, but there is yet a deal of vitality to them. "Mademoiselle de Maupin," "Le Capitaine Fracasse," even "Le Roman de la Momie" and "Spirite" may be read with pleasure. It is true that it is almost impossible to speak of them in the same breath with the best of Balzac, with "Madame Bovary" or "Les Fleurs du Mal," but this is a question of degree. Mr. Palache does not go into any extensive comparisons of the output of the Romantic movement in France and neither does he relate the work of that period with the work of today. There are indications that he comprehends these problems, indeed, actual hints as to his opinions; but they are scattered and not unified as they should be. Such a procedure apparently was not part of his scheme. His book, perhaps, should be accepted for what it is—a series of bright flashlights on an absorbing period crowded with astonishing figures and one figure in particular, that of Gautier, walking through each flashlight. Taken in this way "Gautier and the Romantics" will appeal strongly to the reader whether or not he is familiar with the literary history so hastily—and yet so vividly—covered.

If he does not know the period he will have brought home to him a number of men and women that will excite his curiosity and lead him into further investigations. He will want to know more about Flaubert, having seen him as a man in this book. Baudelaire will stir him and Baudelaire should, for today in France Baudelaire's star still rises and the poet of "Les Fleurs du Mal" is rapidly assuming a significance that may place him only below Racine in the long history of French verse. Racine was the bête noir of the Romantic period in French letters and yet he has withstood all these countless onslaughts of infuriated young men in rose waistcoats and Spanish capes. French literature, perhaps more than any other national literature, has been a colorful romance in itself. Its dominating figures have been as curious and exotic as the creations of their own books. The reader, therefore, who is unacquainted with it will have his curiosity titillated by the brilliant glimpses of astonishing characters in Mr. Palache's book. And if the reader is already familiar with French letters and somewhat intimate with the personalities of the figures who controlled it between 1830 and 1870, then Mr. Palache's study will serve as a reminder. It will bring back to his mind all those men and women who crowd the pages of the journals of Edmond and Jules de Goncourt, of the Magny dinners and all the monstrous arguments that took place there, of brilliant repartee and astounding witticisms, of books that were events and events that became books, of high causes and brave defeats and brief victories, of Rabelaisian laughter and, above all, le mot juste.

Some Murders Which Shocked Our Forebears

NEWSPAPERS and novels have proved conclusively that nothing interests more people and fascinates them more utterly than a murder, especially a particularly horrible and brutal murder. If it is also cloaked in mystery and uncertainty, so much the better. But to touch the highest point of fascination it must be a callous, savage, shocking crime. Mr. Pearson, being an experienced librarian and an author of insight, understands very well this characteristic of human nature. One of his previous books, "Studies in Murder," showed how expertly he can analyze and present famous murder cases, and now he proves again how thrilling old tales of bloody deeds can be. For any one of these fourteen accounts is fit to challenge attention and share interest with the case that for so many days has been filling the newspapers and affording material for argument wherever two people meet. And all of them date back to the last century, some of them even to its early years.

The opening account, "Murder at Smutty Nose," is about a very famous crime committed on one of the Isles of Shoals over fifty years ago. The case has won particular distinction because Celia Thaxter, then living on the adjoining island of Appledore, wrote an account of the murder for The Atlantic Monthly which Mr. Pearson refers to as "one of the rare instances in which an American author of first-rate ability has told the story of an actual murder as fact and not as fiction." The famous murder of Dr. Parkman by Professor Webster of Harvard in 1849, which he calls "America's classic murder," Mr. Pearson relates with graphic pen, ending it with wicked old Ben Butler's retort, "Harvard University? Ah, yes! We hanged one of their professors the other day." But he seems to have been misinformed as to the occasion that called it forth, for it is said by Bostonians of that day to have been Butler's comment when Harvard declined to honor him with the LL.D. it was accustomed to give to the Governors of Massachusetts.

One of the cases is that of the murder of Captain White of Salem, a most mysterious crime, away back in 1830, wherein Daniel Webster, for the prosecution of the suspect, made a famous speech. The Molyneux murder trial in New York in the latter '90s comes nearer to our own day, as also does the Fall River Borden case, in 1802. The latter the author pronounces "without parallel in the criminal history of America." The infamous Benders, who were murdering right and left in Kansas in 1873, introduce a case of murder by wholesale.

There is variety in the fourteen cases which Mr. Pearson has brought together, variety of scene, of motive, of circumstance, but they are alike in being peculiarly grisly, callous and shocking. Mr. Pearson makes each tale a fascinating bit of literature.

She Nearly Married Oscar Wilde

tells "the story of her flurried years" in

I Have This To Say

With a frankness that only a woman in our day is capable of, she tells about Henry James, Joseph Conrad, Somerset Maugham, H. G. Wells, Arnold Bennett, Oscar Wilde, W. H. Hudson, D. H. Lawrence, Thomas Hardy, Ford Madox Ford. Her book, as the N. Y. Sun says: "is a long roll call of famous names." The very intensity and vividness of her confessions makes the book more than a book of reminiscence. It is a rare and precious work of literature.

INTESTINAL GARDENING for the PROLONGATION OF YOUTH by the National Secretary of the Health Education Society, With Foreword by
HARVEY W. WILEY, M. D.
Formerly Chief of the Bureau of Chemistry of the United States Government.

This book describes in plain language the manner in which ninety per cent. of "Civilized" people unknowingly become the victims of many maladies, such as rheumatism, heart disease, liver and kidney disorders, and cancer through the insidious action of common putrefactive bacteria.

The intestinal canal of man is shown to be in reality a garden which daily grows more plants than a thousand farms produce in a year. In health, nature sows the intestinal tract with protective plants that produce a mild acid in which putrefactive germs cannot generate; but constipation, and other causes, enable the poisonous germs, or "weeds," to crowd out the microscopic native protective plants.

This book also describes the simple methods which science has discovered of triumphing over this condition without the aid of drugs or medicines.

foster-mother's favorite. She crams his head with her teachings, training him to find mice and dig for them; to hunt rabbits by patience and craft rather than speed; to map the woods and the waters and all their havens in his memory; to learn that the porcupine does not rattle his quills for nothing, and that the skunk has his own reasons for fearing nothing under the heavens.

His greatest handicap, however, is that his nose is "blind" and that his legs are sadly short; likewise his wind. But he has a brain that can learn and he has special gifts to set against his disadvantages. He can sprint a hundred yards faster than a greyhound, he has the courage of a lion and in fighting he possesses a strange dexterity and an ability to find a paralyzing hold on his adversary's throat.

So, as he grows to maturity, he and La Sombra hunt together, running with the pack, whose leader the bull-terrier later becomes. Then, one day, wolves and wolf-ways grow abhorrent to him and he deserts his companions. Instinct and the atavistic urge lure him to the haunts of man and through his love for a little child he is finally restored to his erstwhile owner, Tucker Croaden.

HELL'S KITCHEN

NINTH AVENUE is a feeble and jejune picture of low-life aspiring to high-life. It is a factual representation of life in Hell's Kitchen, New York, as experienced by a girl with a taste for better things. Sunday morning in the Palmer flat is given through the eyes of Blanche, the family's ugly duckling. Blanche has ideals and vague dreams of masculine perfection, of refinement, of improving and elevating conversation, and of learning the meaning of life. She is stifled by the mean shrewdness, the chicaneries, the petty back-biting, the narrow bigotries of her family, their ugliness, their complacence. The untidy sprawl of their day of leisure typifies all that is disgusting in their way of life, to Blanche.

Blanche's father is a broken-down barkeeper. Her older brother Philip has a small courage, inherited from the mother, which is completely submerged in physical inferiority and lack of conviction. Her sister Mabel knows how to be careful and how to make the men spend all their money on her. Her younger brother Harry is a thug and gangster and minor prizefighter. Her mother and Philip are sympathetic toward Blanche but they do not appreciate her. They cannot understand why she wastes her time reading books, going out with penniless men, and airing unpopular, highbrow views.

Rather than stay at home, Blanche goes out with men. It is no wonder she tires of the monotony of it. The reader also becomes bored with the endless, inane conversations in which Blanche defends her virtue and assures her escorts that she is saving herself for her ideal lover. The petting in dance halls and cabarets and taxicabs and Blanche's sordid and murky hallway is presented with such wearily cerebral analysis on the author's part that any spark of interest it may have had for Blanche could not possibly survive.

Blanche's family and friends and associates seem to have a moral as well as a physical repulsiveness. A Maxim Gorki might have discovered and revealed a sort of sinister beauty in Harry and his "fixed" boxing match, in Mabel and her careful calculations, in Mrs. Palmer and her defeated vision of a more ample and gracious mode of existence, in Mr. Palmer and his hysterical self-assertions. Mr. Bodenheim makes of these unhappy characters the easily spineless objects for his indifferent and supercilious contempt. He does not even bother to listen to them carefully; whatever native richness of idiom they may have is blurred in the transmission. His conversation is hopelessly and depressingly false throughout.

When Blanche at length discovers Greenwich Village and the conversation of a certain misunderstood and reviled poet and novelist (who conceals a lofty and aristocratic soul beneath his unprepossessing exterior), named Max Oppendorf, it appears that the day is about to be saved. Blanche does not, however, fall in love with the author's engaging self-portrait. She finds her dream-man in Eric Starling, a man with a slight dash of negro blood. Mr. Bodenheim's attempt to describe the emotion of love is even more inept than his failure, in the earlier chapters, to work up an authoritative hate. Blanche finds peace with Eric, and consummation in the acceptance of her writings. The difficulty is that Blanche does not find acceptance, with the reader, of her authenticity or her importance.

A MILL-TOWN STORY

NOT quite fair to her readers is Ruth Comfort Mitchell in this story of a mill town in the South, for she gives to her heroine flaming red hair and then does not endow her with the temper and the temperament they are sure to expect her to have. Instead, she is a serious, capable, steady, serene kind of girl, as nice and likable as if her hair had been a golden chestnut; and if her ship of life gets tossed about a bit by storms and tempests the fault is not hers. The story is about this Glen Darrow and a wild young Southern mountaineer, a splendid creature physically, whom the father of Glen takes in hand and sets going so efficiently in the path of success that he seems about to win through to ownership of the mill which is the town's chief industry. And along with that he wants to marry Glen; and she, when the time comes round to that point, is deeply moved by loyalty to her father, who had lived and died in the hope that this marriage would some day come to pass.

And then things begin to happen which make a mess of the nice, orderly pattern Glen expected her life to follow. The whole town is presently thrown into the highest state of excitement it had known for many a day. It is not a complicated story, but it is interestingly and humorously told, and the background of the life of the Southern town, with its sharp social cleavages, is entertainingly sketched in. Its most interesting and most skillful feature, however, is its character depiction—for which its author has a marked gift. So distinctly, and with such individuality of line and color, does she sketch each one of her people, even those of small consequence to the story, that some of them barely escape the look of caricature. But she makes them all so alive and so entertaining that they give zest to an otherwise slight little tale.

RESTRAINED MELODRAMA

THE DANCING FLOOR. By John Buchan. 296 pp. New York: Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.50.*

HERE is a book starting out like a competent and conventional character study that turns, after a hundred pages or so, into one of the best adventure stories of the year. Colonel Buchan, as those who have read "Greenmantle" and "The Three Hostages" already know, has the happy faculty of blending the popular brand of romance, adventure, and mystery with enough valid characterization so that the reader may enjoy his exciting yarns without being offended by the tawdry unreality of the characters usually met with in this type of fiction.

Starting amid the conventional surroundings of fashionable English country life, the story finally works into a mystic atmosphere of medieval witchcraft and pagan orgies set against a background of the picturesque orgies of Greece. Colonel Buchan handles his melodrama with masterful restraint, and the characterization is convincing enough so that the reader is actually interested in knowing what happened to the people he describes.

The story is told by Sir Edward Leithen, a rich and prominent London lawyer and member of Parliament. As he is watching members of the younger set disport themselves at a fashionable ball, his attention is caught by the air of aloofness and the poise of a handsome young Oxford undergraduate. He asks his nephew about the boy and is told that he is Vernon Milburne, a prominent athlete and a brilliant scholar who is quite generally liked and admired but whose detachment and self-possession have always kept him from having intimate friends. Some months later Leithen sprains his ankle while tramping in the country and, seeking first aid in the nearest house, he finds himself at far from the beaten track, Mr. Footner's stories are thoughtfully and ingeniously constructed; they succeed in mystifying, hence in arousing the interest; and that interest they maintain until the end, meanwhile producing an atmosphere of somewhat stricter reality than one is accustomed to find in tales of the type. If one be a lover of detective tales, one will be able to pass some enjoyable moments in the company of Mr. Footner's latest book.

Latest Works of Fiction

EXCHANGED BABIES

THUNDERHAWK. A Tale of the Wabash Flatwoods. By David Wulf Anderson. 288 pp. New York: Doubleday, Page & Co. $2

DAVID WULF ANDERSON'S novel "Thunderhawk" is laid in pioneer Indiana, along the banks of the Wabash—romantic trail of Tonty, Clarke, Tecumseh, Harrison and of generations of Indian chiefs before them. The theme is the age-old one of heredity, over which scientists have written and wrangled for centuries without coming to any satisfactory conclusion. Mr. Anderson, however, insists that blood will tell; for, according to him "Y'u cayn't make a thoroughbred out'n a scrub, and y'u cayn't make a scrub out'n a thoroughbred."

As in Mark Twain's "Pudd'nhead Wilson," an obscurely born but maternally fiercely ambitious woman exchanges two boy babies in their cradles, whereupon the story proceeds to show their reactions to the unexpected environment into which each is thrust.

Gilbert Redetark, heir to the great estate of Thunderhawk, apparently the lineal descendant of a Saxon noble of King Alfred's time, grows up a card sharp, a robber and a murderer. While Shock Tarvin, a nobody, a pearl-fisher, a river rat who lives in a ramshackle houseboat, has all the instincts of the gentleman born.

The woman in the case is Meeje Glenbrocken, daughter of that Captain Glenbrocken who fell fighting at the side of the Greek patriot, Markos Bozzaris, at the battle of Karpenisi. For family and financial reasons, Meeje is betrothed to Gilbert; but her soul revolts against him and, on her wedding day, she runs away from home and seeks shelter on the houseboat of young Tarvin, who protects her from the unpleasant advances of the bridegroom-to-be. The events which follow show Meeje where her heart really lies. A valuable necklace also plays a major rôle in the story, and the theft and recovery of a $30,000 pearl which is to complete the otherwise perfect string provides the element of mystery.

"Thunderhawk" makes no pretensions to fine writing; but the simple and, at times, naïve language in which it is clothed fits the primitive setting and detracts nothing from the interest of the book.

WHIMSICAL FANTASY

THE FIDDLER IN BARLY. By Robert Nathan. New York: Robert M. McBride & Co. $2.

IF one enjoys a whimsical story, told with a touch of fantasy and a seasoning of a sprightly humor, one may find much that is pleasing in "The Fiddler in Barly." This book can hardly be considered a novel in the accepted meaning of the term; it has neither the length of a novel nor that minimum of unity which one would expect a novel to display; it is chaotic in form, sketchy in substance, and discursive to the last degree; its characters are outlined rather than clearly limned, and one hardly knows which among the dramatis personæ have the leading rôles; the background is vague as a haze, and the reader is provided with little more than random incidents and random impressions—and yet the book makes pleasant reading, the characters have the interest of persons slightly unreal and still attractive because of their unreality, while by his occasional lapse into the bizarre and the fantastic the author lends piquancy and savor to the book.

The story—if a rambling assortment of half-connected anecdotes can be termed a story—deals with a fiddler who suddenly appears as if from nowhere with his dancing dog, and who secures the position of hired man for a widow who doesn't really need his services. It is now his business to make life merry for the folk of the neighborhood, and this he does to the best of his ability; and his fiddling puts cheer into the hearts of many, including a nine-year-old girl, whose deeply cherished longing is for a yellow dress, and a postmaster who is always going to go to China, but never leaves his native village. Various other characters enter in to lend the narrative quality and zest; and these characters are by no means entirely of the human species; for, in addition to the Widow Sebold, the Rev. Flood, some small boys, and a pair of lovers, they include a lonesome robin, Bartholomew the rooster, Musket the dog and a stray cricket—and the latter supply quite as much of the conversation as do the former. Moreover, the conversation of these "dumb animals" is quite interesting, and in places distinctly pointed; and, far from objecting to it, one finds it a decided addition to a book which, in any event, could make but small claims on the ground of reality.

While the tale is by no means preachy or dogmatic, it would seem that the author is not without a message; and this he suggests time after time; but never more clearly than in the words of the fiddler when he reflects,

> In this village the young are taught to avoid joy; their elders fill the earth with cabbages rather than flowers. This is because they think there will be flowers enough in heaven. Pain is often very pleasant, in view of the relief afterwards. But what a waste of fertile earth, to improve it with cabbages. And what a waste of childish joy, to improve it with godliness.

Such is the cheerful message that Mr. Nathan spreads throughout his pages. And as a result we have a book which, while not without its defects, will not only fill a cheerful hour or two but leave a pleasant after effect.

DOG INTO WOLF

THE WHITE WOLF. By Max Brand. 334 pp. New York, London: G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.

IN "The White Wolf," Max Brand, specialist in animal stories, has written a vivid tale of wild-life adventure. Because of his insight into the souls of the beasts of the forest, his four-footed protagonists display more virtues and greater acumen than do the few human beings who enter the tale.

White Wolf, the bull-terrier who has strayed from his natural environment, has more real personality than Tucker Crosden who bred him; while La Sombra, the wolf-mother, is a sinister, fascinating figure in her unswerving devotion to the strange foster-son who fills her heart and mind.

Close to the San Jacinto spur of the Rockies lived Tucker Crosden, a giant in strength, a brute in bearing whose sole passion in life is the desire to breed the perfect bull-terrier. Time and again he thinks he has succeeded, only to be disappointed in some slight flaw. Finally, in Nell, he imagines he sees the road to success.

> Here were legs splendidly straight and huge in bone, a great chest, a pair of shoulders to glad the eye with their cleanness and their fine muscles, a neck neither too long nor too short and not covered with loose skin. There was a tail, too, set in low, thick at the butt, tapering beautiful-looking as straight as a string, with a spring set in the base of it; ° ° ° a glorious head, with little triangular eyes and a "fill up" clear to the eyes. Like the back of a man's hand.

Convinced that dogs would be physically improved by a rougher life in the open, Crosden brings Nell up into the mountains to bear her litter. But while her master is away trapping the terrier and her puppies are attacked and killed by Black Wolf and his mate, La Sombra. Only one of them escapes, the first-born, the strongest and the biggest of them all, who has wit enough to flee.

Tottering up the crusted snow of the mountainside, the little fellow takes refuge in the cave where La Sombra is nursing her own litter of cubs. There, unseen, by the wolf-mother, he snuggles down in the middle of softly-furred bodies and after quivering for a time with terror he goes to sleep. In the darkness La Sombra does not notice her strange nursling and when, after several weeks, she first examines him in full daylight, she is convinced that she has brought into the world a white wolf.

Despite Black Wolf's hatred and contempt, White Wolf remains his

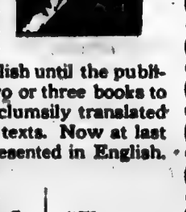
THE WORKS OF STENDHAL



No recent publishing event has called forth such enthusiasm from American critics as our publication of the complete, unabridged works of Stendhal. The translations are done, or supervised by Mr. C. K. Scott Moncrieff, noted translator of Proust. Recognized as one of the world's greatest novelists, there was practically no way of appreciating Stendhal's extraordinary works in English until the publication of this collected edition. The two or three books to be had in our language were either clumsily translated or translated from inaccurate French texts. Now at last the complete works are being truly presented in English.

Adventures in Typography, or An Esthetic Pilgrimage

William Dana Orcutt Tells of the Arduous Research Which Preceded His "Perfect Book"

IN QUEST OF THE PERFECT BOOK, REMINISCENCES AND REFLECTIONS OF A BOOKMAN. By William Dana Orcutt. Colored frontispiece and 86 facsimiles, reproductions and other illustrations. 317 pp. Boston: Little, Brown & Co. $5.

BY JEROME E. BROOKS

THE quest of the perfect book is the title of an esthetic pilgrimage by one who, having stood on a succession of mountain tops, appears to be most comfortable among the snug and cozy foothills. It is a friendly and intimate record of the chief events of the author's thirty-five years' peregrinations to the literary and historic shrines of Europe in his intensive studies of types and texts. After such repeated excursions, considering their unvarying incentive, one would expect so persistent a pilgrim to have acquired certain characteristic habits of academic precision; formal speech and a meticulous regard for exact facts. From such a highly trained and specialized source should have come a memorable book. But no such evidence of sure and abundant scholarship is apparent in this volume; it is, on the contrary, informal, fairly haphazard, garrulous, inexact in several matters and enriched by the enthusiasm of an amateur rather than the ardor of a scholar. It is animated, we think, much more by a desire to share fireside reminiscences than to add to the knowledge of a world thirsting for information.

When he was a young man, apparently serving his apprenticeship at the University Press, Cambridge, Mr. Orcutt came across the then new productions of Morris's Kelmscott Press. It is obvious that he did not believe even the "Chaucer" to be "the perfect book." That may have been lèse-majesté in those days—it is an opinion now expressed by many competent students. But Morris's work awakened in him, at any rate, "an overwhelming desire to put [himself] in the volumes [he] produced." This passionate and understandable fervor had been felt by printers before, and has given to the world some books of undeniable beauty. It led him, quite naturally, to Italy. His instinct in that first journey was fortunate, for there, under the tuition of the late Dr. Biagi of the Laurentian Library he found a model for his "perfect" type. This was the hand-letter in one of the so-called humanistic manuscripts produced in Italy in the late fifteenth century, and it was this apotheosis of the art that he resolved to re-create. This resulted in his production of Petrarch's "Trionfi," after a long and arduous search for the correct illustration, suitable vellum, and the proper ink (which he had manufactured exactly as the scribes of the fifteenth century prepared their pigments), and, finally, a sympathetic and comprehending typesetter. The wearying, though fascinating, work was done at last and the "Triumphs," in its opulent, humanistic type, offered to the world. It won, from students and from other master printers, unqualified praise. There was, too, later, the added award of a decoration from the Italian Government for his revival of the humanistic letter. The decoration, one cannot help think, was less a tribute than the praise of his fellow-craftsmen.

A reproduction of the first page of this masterpiece in this volume displays a leaf familiar to students of illuminated Italian manuscripts of the second half of the fifteenth century. It has the conventional, elaborate border and designs, and a type completely harmonizing with a Latin love of decoration. But to the fastidious eye, more caressed, say, by such a type as Jenson's exquisite Roman letter, or its reproduction in the Doves Press publications, the humanistic type is too pretentious, too full of dimpling curves, too suggestive of excessive ornamentation. It was an appropriate character in a period when richly illuminated manuscripts were being produced at the command of wealthy patrons who afforded to despise the new art of printing. The best critics and students have honored Jenson's Roman type with the double superlative of "most perfect," and it is a type eminently satisfying to cultured and to simple tastes. But it was not for simple tastes, obviously, that the humanistic type was revived.

Only the first chapter of this splendidly illustrated volume deals, as a matter of fact, with the search for the perfect type-model and its original use in the "perfect book." In that first chapter, however, one meets Dr. Biagi—a great and devoted humanist—who moves in gracious, friendly fashion throughout Mr. Orcutt's account of his pilgrimages. Indeed, some of the best parts of his book are related to his various encounters with this wise and lovable Italian scholar. Much of the rest of the volume is merely associative, pertaining to the friends he made on his quest; the friends he made through his pen—for Mr. Orcutt is a novelist as well; the great books he examined, the lure of illuminated manuscripts, and a last chapter on one of his favorite themes, the Laurentiana. Although some of these divisions of his book are concerned with such illustrious examples of book-making as the Byzantine Psalter, the Lindisfarne Gospels, the Bedford Book of Hours, the Horae of Anne of Brittany, and such impressive typographical specimens as the Gutenberg Bible, Jenson's De Civitate Dei, the Aldine Hypneratomachia, &c., the accounts of these will afford interest and satisfaction chiefly to booklovers and book collectors. It is suggested by his familiar treatment of these high matters that Mr. Orcutt has not sought to interest the scholars.

It is in the accounts of the friends he acquired that this history should have its widest appeal, for he treats of a number of things, of cabbages and kings, with large discursiveness. He biographs in miniature such notables as Eugene Field, Mary Baker Eddy and Mark Twain (although they never appear together). Shaw, Horace Fletcher—he devotes much space to Fletcher—Henry and William James, Theodore Roosevelt and Cobden-Sanderson. Nor were they all: Hewlett, Dobson, Garnett, Charles Eliot Norton and W. D. Howells, too, move with easy familiarity along the roads he traveled, and he relates an anecdote—sometimes an excellent anecdote—about each of them. Among other things the author offers fairly conclusive evidence that the publishing business is in a parlous state; indeed, one derives the uncomfortable impression that that trade has become an elee-mosynary institution. There are, too, a number of pages devoted to the stomach of Henry James. James also was a devotee of Fletcher, who relieved him from the tyranny of indigestion. In a letter to his brother William, which Mr. Orcutt quotes here, a passage reads: "One must have been through what it relieved me from to know how not suffering from one's food all the while after having suffered all one's life and at last having it cease and vanish, could make one joyously and extravagantly relegate all out-of-door motion to a more and more casual and negligible importance." Fletcherism seems to have cleared up his digestive troubles, but not his style.

Perhaps it is an advantage of this book that no one will be compelled by sheer fascination to read it through straightforwardly. One may skip and jump about to one's heart's content, for that is what the author does. It is an admixture of history with gossip, fact with fancy, beauty with common things, and it is fairly representative of those slices of autobiography of one who has had full, and to him, exciting life.

One may be irritated, of course, by the frequent and unexpected manner in which some of the illustrations intrude themselves upon the text; one may even be inclined to animadvert against the fairly smug and complacent tone of the book, but no one we think, can fail to admire Mr. Orcutt's courage in labeling his "Triumphs" as perfect, in the face of Aldus, Jenson, Bruce Rogers and others. Such familiar treatment of matters usually embalmed in academic texts should give this volume an attraction for book lovers and the readers of biographies. Nor can the collector of limited editions and "prize" books overlook one produced in so elaborate a manner. A note at the end informs us that

> This volume is composed in Poliphilus type, reproduced by the Lanston Monotype Corporation, London, from the Roman face designed in 1499 by Francesco Griffio of Bologna for Aldus Manutius [of Venice], and originally used in the Hypnerotomachia Poliphili. The italic is based upon that designed for Antonio Blado, Printer to the Holy See from 1515 to 1567. The cover, a modern adaptation of [a] Grolier design; [many of] the illustrations now appear in book form for the first time. ° ° ° The plates of the illustrations were made by the Walker Engraving Company, ° ° ° and are printed on De-Jonge's Art Mat. The text paper is Warren's Olde Style. The typography, presswork and binding are by the Plimpton Press. ° ° ° under the personal supervision of William Dana Orcutt.

Palestine Comes Into the Modern World

PALESTINE AWAKE. The Rebirth of a Nation. By Sophie Irene Loeb. Foreword by Nathan Straus. Illustrated. 240 pp. New York: The Century Company. $2.50.

MISS LOEB'S survey of the changes that are taking place in age-old Palestine and making of it a modern, prosperous, progressive country is an excellent piece of reporting. Although it is merely newspaper work put into book form, it gives, perhaps, the best all-round and impartial survey yet made of the results in Palestine of the Zionist movement. She went to all of the important centres of development, she studied all the different things that are being done; she talked with Arabs, Jews and Christians, and reports faithfully the viewpoints and ideas of each; she gives carefully detailed summaries of how each organization working in Palestine spends its money and what it has achieved and is planning for the future. And, what is in the long run more important than any of these things, she brings out clearly the idealism that is the foundation and the inspiration of the movement.

It is a marvelous tale that she relates, suggestive of talismans and magic rings in the sudden changes that have been wrought. Tel Aviv, for instance, which she well describes as "the miracle city of the Eastern world," during the war contained only five persons, and they were watchmen. Six years ago it had 200 houses, of not much consequence. Now it contains 2,700 buildings, modernly built and equipped, worth $18,000,000, where lived, when she was there, 40,000 people, with more thronging in every week. It has schools of all sorts, a water-supply system, a public library, paved streets, electric light and power, factories making a dozen different kinds of things, 3,000 men employed on public improvements, a yearly budget of $375,000. Jerusalem is being made sanitary and provided with modern equipment, while every care is taken to preserve all its shrines and its objects of sacred interest that have meant so much to so many races and religions through so many centuries. Miss Loeb recounts her very interesting conversation with the Mayor of Jerusalem, an Arab whose understanding, sympathetic viewpoint concerning all these varied interests of diverse creeds and races and modern needs offers a lesson in tolerance which might be read with profit by many an American.

The author made a study of the agricultural colonies and schools, and the work that is in progress for reclaiming marsh land and other uncultivated wastes, and devotes a good deal of attention to the very successful agricultural work and experiment that are going on. She did not find anywhere among the Arabs the same welcoming, tolerant, cooperating spirit shown by the Mayor of Jerusalem, but she says that among the younger and more vigorous element there is desire for harmony and willingness to cooperate because of the progress and prosperity that the Zionist movement is bringing. Railway development, says Miss Loeb, is going forward rapidly, and she expects it to make Palestine, in the near future, attractive to the tourist.

Already it is possible, as she did, to have tea in Cairo in the afternoon and breakfast at 10 the next morning in Jerusalem. From Kantara to Jerusalem, a nine-hour trip which formerly took fifteen days by camel, she found excellent sleeping-car accommodations, as comfortable as any in America. The projected bridge across the Suez Canal will permit through trains between Cairo and Jerusalem. There are several long-distance lines with sleeping and dining cars. Many automobile roads are being built and much passenger traffic is cared for in that way. A company has been organized for the purpose of building modern hotels in the chief cities of Palestine. One in Jerusalem was nearing completion when Miss Loeb was there. Already tourist travel is swelling. In 1913, says the author, 3,000 tourists visited Palestine, while in 1924 the tickets issued to tourists numbered 19,470. Over against the many attractions of climate, scenic beauty and historic interest she found everywhere such big preparations being made to attract tourists and make them comfortable that she concludes that a new world playground will soon be "a resort centre that will beckon the whole world."

Frances Newman Cuts a New Caper in the Novel

t was inevitable that the search for fresh improvisations on an old theme should, sooner or later, produce a novel of the calibre of "The Hard-Boiled Virgin." It is a few years ago since the gates let down before what had hitherto been deemed the permissible, and writers who took advantage the new license have been dening themselves rather exuberthan artistically. As is always case when a new province is ed up, or, shall we say?—an old is thrown open anew, the riches ed suddenly at their disposal ted a certain embarrassment—the novelty of the opportunity reed in an over-exploitation of its obvious aspects. The mere to use bigger and braver words—resent livelier and more realistic urse—would not disguise forever inherent banality of the situation. etition is the bane of every movet that attracts a large number of iples, and it was already in evice. It is just at this point that subtle and skillful writer, profitlargely by the familiar ambient h these crude pioneers of unence have created, finds a chance atter upon his labors. From a ain point of view books like ances Newman's first novel register thing that may be looked at er as the end of one stage or the nning of another.

say that a large proportion of e Hard-Boiled Virgin" is bawdy, bawdy of the most impertinent allusive order, and a great deal t quite Shandyan in its relish t might be called the domestico-siological side of life, does not gether dismiss it. To begin with, a very clever essay in a hitherto ttempted medium. It is mannered, odic, it introduces us to the cuinnovation of 285 pages without ngle line of dialogue, and many s sentences are of a portentous th and involution. But once we grown expert in unraveling e thirty-line periods and have overed that the device of beginn each chapter like a feuilleton is the author has deliberately en, we begin to realise that Miss rman is the possessor of an autic style, atonic as anything Jane ten wrote, dry to astringency and the true ironic inflection.

rtain consents, it is true, are d of us at the beginning. We e admit that the daughter of a thy Southern family can grow to urity without a single family atment or discoverable friend save the most casual order, that any a of outdoor recreation is unwn to her, that neither horse nor engages her affection, and that major occupation, throughout years of adolescence, is the acition of sex knowledge by all avery means available, which udes eavesdropping behind curs, consulting encyclopedias surreptitiously, and such very early observations as a wakeful little girl brought into the domestic and nuptial chamber during a crisis of illness may not escape.

Once these admissions have been made we have to grant that Miss Newman has succeeded in giving us a convincing picture of a certain type of unlovely yet not altogether unpathetic girlhood, inhibited from the beginning by the hateful society into which she is born, moving like an automaton through its insincere prejudices and equally insincere permissions, striving despondently to create for herself one romance after another out of its arid material and escaping at last into a liberty that she is too tired and disillusioned to savor, far less appreciate.

Katherine Faraday is the ugly duckling of one of those "first families" in a Southern city whose assumption of aristocracy, on the basis of three mentionable generations and a handful of lares and penates not bought in a dry goods store, so amazes the foreigner. She reads omnivorously, collects her favorite knowledge stealthily, watches her pretty sisters ensnare more or less eligible husbands, studies her body sedulously and tries to comfort herself with the belief that straight, black hair and long lip are only an unusual and unappreciated type of good looks. Tepid and inconclusive philanderings with cadets and army officers that end when letters have been exchanged, and a few attentions from men who are either preempted already or of "the wrong sort," convince her that as a sub-deb on promotion she is definitely a failure. A small legacy enables her to betake herself abroad and unchaperoned. Here the experience around which we must suppose her imagination has hovered for years overtakes her and completely exhausts her curiosity. We leave her the authoress of a successful play, "No Sheets," the inwardness of whose title we also leave Miss Newman to explain for those unskilled in rebus, and convinced that illusions quite as hollow and brittle as any she has crushed still lie before her.

Far more admirable and impressive than the literary allusions with which Miss Newman's story is strawn and which are of the variety and erudition to be expected from the authoress of "The Short Story's Mutations" is her quite wonderful creation of a romantic uncomely little girl, denied the gift of attractiveness and feeding her hunger for love on the desiccated scraps that politeness and perhaps charity fling her way. From "Villette" to "The Hard-Boiled Virgin" is a far, far cry. Yet, each in her own way, it is doubtful whether Charlotte Brontë at her most devastating moments has surpassed the pathos of poor Katherine, with the straight hair and the boyish form that came twenty-five years too early, pressing her quite unworthy cadet's letter to her cheek in the watches of the night and striving to keep the bruise his button has made upon her delicate flesh entrancingly blue and painful until the next meeting. For the button, if for the sake of nothing else, censure dies upon our lips and our heart softens to the hard-boiled virgin of Atlanta, Ga.

WASSERMANN REPEATS.

WEDLOCK. By Jacob Wassermann. Translated from the German by Ludwig Lewisohn. 344 pp. New York: Boni & Liveright. $2.50.

"WEDLOCK" represents another turgid effort on the part of Jacob Wassermann to reveal the canker beneath the appearance of things. The newly translated work has not the incoherence and immaturity of "Oberlin's Three Stages," which should have been an earlier, even juvenile, work from the author of "The World's Illusion." Internal evidence in "Wedlock," dates and references to historical happenings, indicates that it has been written since "The World's Illusion," but there is nothing to show that the author has grown in spiritual stature in the intervening period. On the contrary, the characters and situations of "Wedlock" are recognizable replicas of situations and characters in "The World's Illusion."

A comparison of the American title with the original, "Laudin Und Die Seinen" ("Laudin and His Own"), would seem to demonstrate that an attempt has been made to link the novel to a problem which, presumably, Mr. Wassermann has solved. As it happens, the marriage relation is a large, but still subordinate, part of Mr. Wassermann's ambitiously inclusive program. It cannot be denied that, even at his worst, Mr. Wassermann is very much in earnest. Sincerity, however, is not an end, but merely one of the beginnings of creative writing. Surely a sense of proportion belongs in the equipment of an author, especially one who sets out to clarify and give values to the contemporary scene. The history of the good Dr. Laudin, Mr. Wassermann's current hero, reads like an unintentional burlesque of the sanctified stage of the mawkish and incredible Christian Wahnschafe in "The World's Illusion." If Mr. Wassermann were not totally deficient in humor he would never have permitted Dr. Laudin to affect a sinful woman so strongly that she developed epilepsy. The American for that is fits.

Dr. Laudin indubitably has his effect. Unfortunately, Mr. Wassermann has been even less successful in transmitting the nature of Laudin's power to the reader than he was in carrying conviction for the inspirational nature of Christian Wahnschafe, who had only to enter a room to cause all sorts of people to repent and regret their misspent lives. Christian inspired a helpless rage in the reader, but Dr. Laudin never rises higher than a sort of bored impatience. It is difficult enough to accept him as an eminent lawyer, especially in divorce cases. When the other characters take to trailing him in the night, waiting outside his window for a kind word, groveling at the feet of his office boys for the sake of a chance to see him, reverently touching his brief case, as if it contained the secrets of all the mysteries, it is not even ludicrous.

In Dr. Laudin Mr. Wassermann undertakes to demonstrate what happens, or might happen, to a solid, successful bourgeois citizen in the event of his discovery that the ground beneath his feet, the air he breathes, the forms he observes, and especially the money in his pockets, are mere nothingness, pretense, illusion. Mr. Wassermann is tilting again at the accepted reality in order to prove that it is the dream and the content of the visionary's mind to the effect that all is stupidity, is the true reality. In order to establish that marriage is not always what it is cracked up to be Mr. Wassermann brings to Laudin's office one divorce suit, one marital upset, one quarrel on obscure and subtle grounds between husband and wife, one frustrated marriage after another. This proves, first, that women are conceited and are trying to take away the divine right of men to be the bosses; second, that the institution of marriage has failed and must be succeeded by some new form which shall be derived out of the intuitions and inner consciousnesses of intellectual aristocrats and by them passed down to the masses.

It appears, also, that the ritual of justice in the courts is a sham, the practitioners of the law a crew of ruffians and hijackers, the guidance of parents a betrayal of the expectations of the young, and the whole of middle-class customs, reasonings, philosophy, a pretentious lie. An enormous quantity of characters, a sensational number of suicides, deaths, misuse of trust funds, counterfeitings, endless discussions on generalities, and startling and inexplicable and unmotivated changes in Dr. Laudin seem to be necessary for the working out of Mr. Wassermann's intention. The translation by Ludwig Lewisohn adds to rather than mitigates the florid excesses of the original.

A SEA STORY

THE BLIND SHIP. By Jean Barreyre. 285 pp. New York: Lincoln MacVeagh, The Dial Press. $2.50.

IF the Pre-Raphaelite movement, so-called, was an effort to bring art back to something like its pristine simplicity, and this is generally understood to have been the program of that quaint brotherhood, then the tale "The Blind Ship," by Jean Barreyre, might appropriately be regarded as a suggestion toward a Pre-Raphaelite movement in sea fiction.

And we have little doubt that in certain quarters the author's efforts—if conscious efforts they really were—to naturalize nautical jargon into the everyday speech of landsmen will meet with approval. Why not, for instance, call a deck a floor, and a companion-ladder a stairway, these readers will say. Well, why not?

For one a highly cogent reason—rob the sea of its distinctive vocabulary, and the flavor, the peculiar tang which this vocabulary contributes to any narrative of the sea, is lost. Of course those who have no literary palate, those who are so lazy they will not look up the definition of a strange word, those who cannot welcome with gusto what is for them something exotic, will be pleased with Mr. Barreyre's slovenly telling of his tale. For these, unfortunately, the story came to the wrong reviewer, for the present writer holds that the marvelously preserved Anglo-Saxon vocabulary which has endured from maritime generation to generation is a rich inheritance that future English letters will do well zealously to guard.

To leave this phase of the matter, however, and to pass to the yarn Mr. Barreyre has labored to put forth. What is to be recorded under this head? In "The Blind Ship" the author tells a tale of sufficient gruesomeness to please any addict of Stevenson or Poe. As the result of fellow-jack, contracted by the crew of the ship Sunshine in handling the body of a dead Lascar stowaway, one by one the whole ship's company goes blind.

In this we concede to Mr. Barreyre as excellent a conception as ever fell to the lot of Clark Russell or Morgan Robertson—a conception worthy of Stevenson or Poe. And perhaps the author of "The Blind Ship" should not be taken too heavily to task for falling short of these masters. Yet he chose to undertake a type of narrative for which there are masters at hand from whom to learn, and the requirements in that genre are few and not difficult to understand. Moreover, they boil down, in the last analysis, to one, which may be expressed in the single word, "effect." In every paragraph, in every line, almost in every word, the author must produce his effect, or his accomplishment as a whole is negligible. And it may be seriously questioned whether the key to success does not lie in endless artistic refinement rather than in genius. Yet only once does Mr. Barreyre write a line which really conveys horror. It is when he writes of the captain and the mate, who have come, almost simultaneously, to the realisation that they too are losing their sight:

Then, still in silence, their fingers reached out, and they began feeling the surface of the table and backs of their chairs. It was as if they were already conning the first melancholy lessons of the blind.

The whole fact of the matter is that Jean Barreyre, in "The Blind Ship," has tried to spin too lengthy a yarn. He had adequate material for a short story which, if told with to get breakfast and wring out the clothes and hang them on the line, she managed so successfully she was even able to take the Chairmanship of the charity bazaar. It was then she discovered the fact that: "Capable persons seemed to have to bear all the burdens of the world."

In our modern city or smart suburban life we are but too prone to forget that people like these exist, and it is well that we should be reminded of the fact, especially if it can be done gently, in the mildly entertaining manner of Fannie Kilbourne's pleasant book. For despite occasional phrases such as "what we would have used to call a nice piece of change," the book as a whole is agreeably written besides being true to the particular phase of life its author has chosen to depict.

FIFTEEN MYSTERY STORIES

THE MASSINGHAM BUTTERFLY. By J. S. Fletcher. 292 pp. Boston: Small, Maynard & Co. $2.

EACH mystery story in this collection of fifteen by J. S. Fletcher is worked out with the precision of a geometrical problem; every line, every event dovetails with the one before and the one after; and there is such a lack of waste motion that the perfection becomes tiring. Each story is told in clear, colorless and measured English—prose that is never in modulation—and hence the bare writing becomes tiring, too.

And, at the risk of being trite, one may add that the crime investigators and criminals of Mr. Fletcher are very far from real. If they were at all credible they would do something human and irrelevant now and again and so upset the march of plot. Champanhaye, the expert who happens to solve the mystery of the two paste Massingham butterflies, remains a name, and whosoever calls him a human being falls heir to the delusion that where there is a name there also is an object.

One story, "The Houseboat," is amusing for its O. Henry twist. One pair, a brother and sister, buy a houseboat from a man who doesn't own it. A few hours later another pair, brother and sister likewise, make the same purchase from the same rogue. The pairs meet on the deck of the boat in bewilderment, and both remain until, weeks later, the rightful possessor comes along. But the brothers and sisters have become mixed up in a double engagement and wedding, so they bless the thief that brought them together. In fact, they send him a little present in the bargain.

That is the most human story of the lot, save, perhaps, "Don Quixote of Scotland Yard." And pleasure, like gold, being where you find it, those who take pleasure in mystery stories will, no doubt, enjoy these and other stories that go to make up the collection of "The Massingham Butterfly."

MR. TUTT AGAIN

THE Mr. Tutt who is the central figure in these stories is the same shrewd and kindly old lawyer who has appeared in other stories by Mr. Train. He is a knight-errant of the law, championing the innocent and the oppressed regardless of whether or not they are able to pay for his services. If the oppressor, as so often happens, appears to have the law on his side, that merely serves to put Mr. Tutt on his mettle. He knows all the tricks of his profession and is ready to use the shadiest of them to promote the ends of justice. And when the law fails him, he has other weapons, as in the story entitled "The Man Who Fell Over Backward," where he directs his attack, not against his opponent's legal position, which is impregnable, but against the pompous self-esteem which makes his adversary keenly sensitive to ridicule. The case is dropped like a hot potato, and Mr. Tutt's client gets his rights, although he has no claim that could be enforced at law.

Another story, "Treasure-Trove," relates how Mr. Tutt uses the methods of the confidence man to get the better of a grasping and rascally old skinflint who, though a swindler, manages to keep within the letter of the law. Mr. Tutt does not, as confidence men do, deliberately set the trap for his victim, but finding it, by a happy accident, already set and baited, he does not hesitate to make use of it. Led on by his own avarice and thinking that he is getting very much the better of the bargain, the skinflint cancels a mortgage which he is about to foreclose and receives in return a bundle of absolutely worthless securities.

These two stories have been chosen for special comment, not because they are better than the others in the book—one might name several that are at least as good—but because they show more clearly than some of the others that Mr. Tutt is more interested in seeing justice done than in adhering to a strictly correct legal procedure. But lest it be thought that these stories depend for their interest upon legal tangles alone, it should be remarked that Mr. Tutt is much more than an unusually clever lawyer. He is a most human and lovable old gentleman with a rich fund of humor. As a rule his humor is kindly, but his wit can show a razor edge when occasion demands it. He keenly enjoys a legal battle, and nothing gives him so much joy as to "swangdangle," to use his own expression, an opponent who has, up to the crucial moment, seemed to have all the better of the argument.

In Mr. Tutt, Arthur Train has created a character who has already gained a host of friends and who will undoubtedly continue to make new ones. These stories about him, like others previously issued, are both ingenious and amusing.

A WOMAN DETECTIVE

MADAME STOREY. By Gilbert Frankau. New York: George H. Doran Company. $2.

MADAME STOREY, the heroine of this book, is what may be termed a "practical psychologist." Her object in life is to help suffering men and women through her uncanny insight into the workings of the human mind; but she finds that her psychological investigations take her inevitably into the realm of crime and that her services as a detective are much more in demand than her services as an adviser of the needy. And to detective work, accordingly, she devotes the greater part of her talents; and in the unraveling of intricate and baffling problems she displays the skill of a female Sherlock Holmes.

In the present volume the reader is allowed to follow four of Madame Storey's exploits—four exploits, each of which is embodied in a complete and separate story. In three of these tales the detective—according to the approved methods of her kind—is permitted to find the person responsible for an unaccountable murder; in the fourth, she confines her attention to an affair relatively so commonplace as a bank robbery and ends by identifying the elusive and ingenious "smoke bandits."

Typical of the book is the opening story, in which a wealthy man of none too savory a moral reputation is found dead in his own library. Suspicion falls at once upon his young secretary, who is known to have been the object of his unwelcome advances; but, after the blame is apparently fixed undeniably upon her, a young aviator appears and claims to have been responsible; and the affair speedily develops into a contest in prevarication between the two young people, each of whom seeks to plead guilty. Needless to say, Madame Storey, with her acute perceptions, readily sees through their falsifications and she is not long in discovering the real criminal in a person whom, of course, one would not have been in the least disposed to suspect.

Similarily, in "The Scrap of Lace" and "In the Round Room" the author ends his story according to the usual "surprise" method by fixing the blame on characters that appeared not in the least guilty. The latter tale is in some ways the most interesting in the book; it concerns the death of a woman under circumstances that seem to throw the blame conclusively upon the husband, particularly since Madame Storey herself has advised him a few days before that his wife's death will provide him with the only means of escape from an almost intolerable relationship. When the wife is found dead from a revolver wound one, of course, leaps to the conclusion that the husband is the culprit; but that this suspicion is unfounded is proved by Madame Storey by a clever and elaborate process of analysis.

On the whole, while not traveling

WILLA CATHER'S NEW BOOK

My Mortal Enemy

The theme is the fundamental antagonism between men and women, entangled with an irresistible attraction. Myra Henshawes tragedy is the tragedy of nearly all the great and brilliant loves of legend.

It is the logical and merciless conclusion of a capricious, passionate, idolatrous love.

"It is as fragile and delicate and simple a tale as A LOST LADY. Without having any of the surface characteristics of a profound book, it is profound." Fanny Butcher

"MY MORTAL ENEMY is a brilliant study of temperament. Nothing that Miss Cather has written— not even A LOST LADY—has more vitality; and nothing is more relentless." Atlantic Monthly

"This is an age when condensation is a virtue. Miss Cather has that gift, and in half a dozen poses she completes the picture of a woman and her demon." New York World ever a heightened intensity, might easily have been a masterpiece of its kind. It is unfortunate Mr. Barrymore should not have perceived this.

It might be added, to close, that the publisher of "The Blind Ship" suggests that the story might also be taken as allegorical. This, of course, puts a somewhat different face on the matter, justifying, to some degree at least, both the negligence of the vocabulary and the lowered tonal effect. It is to be doubted, however, whether the author had any such allegorical purpose in mind. He is too palpably trying to write a tale of horror to escape by any such ready excuse.

TISH AGAIN

TISH PLAYS THE GAME. By Mary Roberts Rinehart. 284 pp. New York: The George H. Doran Company. $2.

TISH the incomparable has come out of her retirement and again had such adventures as maiden lady never had before. Her sophisticated and her sardonic nephew, Charlie Sands, was sure something was going to happen when he remarked to her devoted friends, Aggie and Lizzie, who narrated the stories: "I'll bet you a dollar and a quarter she's up to something right now. She's too quiet. Besides, she asked me the other day if doubtful methods were justifiable to attain righteous ends." The particular thing that "our dear Tish" was "up to" at that time furnishes the first of the five short stories that compose the book and gives it its title. The "game" Tish played was golf and she was learning it in order to take the snaps out of the course of true love in the affair of two young friends. Her effort was triumphantly successful, and, of course, was accompanied by the mischances and the misunderstandings that usually hamper Tish's valiant endeavors, but it had an unexpected aftermath which brought deep regret to Tish and her friends.

In the second tale, "The Baby Blimp," which is perhaps the most hilarious of them all, Tish adventures into the moving picture game. The next one has to do with a mysterious case of hijacking, Tish's share in it, and the results for a pair of young lovers. When Charlie Sands week-ended with his aunt and her friends and suggested that they stage a treasure hunt as a scheme for making money for a charitable purpose the result was what the narrator calls "that terrible night" wherein Tish had many adventures and was finally arrested. The last story, "The Gray Goose," harks back at the start to a time when Letitia Carberry was developing psychic power and experimenting with spirit mediums, automatic writing and such things and links this up with her gallant endeavor to prove to a long-suffering husband that his wife's legs were not paralyzed but as good as anybody's.

Through all the tales Tish's shrewd philosophy, her serious-faced humor, her willingness to undertake any scheme that she happens to think of and her keen pleasure in adventure for its own sake are as evident as they have always been in Mrs. Rinehart's accounts of her exploits. It is a real feat of inventive resourcefulness in fiction that she is still able to carry on Tish's adventures with robust humor and high spirits through so great a variety of situations.

A PROBLEM NOVEL

OUT OF THE CLAY. By Harriet T. Comstock. 291 pp. New York: Doubleday, Page & Co. $2.

MISS COMSTOCK'S novels have achieved popularity because they are a combination of two very salable elements: thesis and romance. By the same token they alienate themselves from art. The problem novel is not seldom provocative and in a sociological way important, but as art it usually fails to meet the test of time. When it becomes adulterated by sentimental romance, it stands no chance of meeting the test of time. The problem involved is nearly always dodged to make room for the romance, and those concerned, once they have learned their lesson or had their eyes opened, are dealt with kindly. Miss Comstock's new novel, "Out of the Clay," is very clearly a case in point.

"Out of the Clay" is even less worth reading than many similar books because, aside from its romantic coloring, the human beings involved are not human. A few of them have human elements, the majority of them not even that. By the improbability of their characters and the frequent improbability of their actions they weaken whatever force is left to the story after sentiment creeps into it. The problem of the story, as set forth boldly on the jacket, is "What Becomes of the Children of Divorced Couples?" Mrs. Comstock's answer apparently is: The children of divorced couples suffer more than a little inconvenience through the action of their parents, but in the end they do very well indeed. In the present case the son of one such couple falls in love with the daughter of another such couple, and after clearing up a few unpleasantnesses, marries her. Miss Comstock, it is true, does introduce some element of tragedy into her story. She shows us a thoroughly unhappy mother who, for her daughter's happiness, is forced to commit suicide. But she makes that mother so little real that she wins neither sympathy nor belief for her, particularly for her reason in divorcing her husband. He, it seems, had sown wild oats long before he was married, and when his wife afterward discovered it, her idealistic nature could not get over the shock.

For those who care nothing about logic and motivation and character, the book is not uninteresting. It is written with a very professional hand, but it does not ring true, and it certainly does not solve the problem of the children of divorced couples. And if the problem novel, as a form of literature, is in itself a dubious one, what of the problem novel that evades its problem?

AMERICAN HOME LIFE

THE HORTON TWINS. By Fannie Kilbourne. New York: Dodd, Mead & Co. $2.

THE cynical and the sophisticated might easily look upon Fannie Kilbourne's new book as one more horrific warning of the perils of matrimony, expressed in twins, dishwashing and a small house in a small town, with croup and a ten-dollars-a-month raise in salary as the very acme of excitement. But cynics and sophisticates have no need to concern themselves with this simple, pleasant presentation of life as it is lived by the simple, commonplace majority, whose favorite form of intellectual diversion is a visit to the "movies," and who are far too busily engaged with the problem of finding the wherewithal to pay the grocer and the landlord to have much time or energy left for the analysis of their own emotions or those of anybody else. People like these, living quietly, working hard, doing their very best to bring up their children and to make ends meet, may be humdrum and commonplace and not particularly interesting, but they form an extremely important and perhaps the largest part of the nation, so that a book which treats of their lives intimately and sincerely, as this one does, has at least as much right to be called realism as a novel dealing with the givers of cocktail parties or with the factory workers of the lower east side.

The Hortons and their neighbors are all people of this average type, living in the small town of Montrose, not very far from Chicago, a place where the young married women do their own housework and take care of their own babies. "Dotty" Horton, wife of William and mother of the twins who give their name to the book, and with whose birth the first story in it begins, is the central figure as well as the narrator of each of the eleven episodes which make up the volume. Before the babies were born, Dotty had decided that she wasn't going to be a bit like the young mothers she knew; she wasn't going to talk about baby food in the middle of a hand at bridge, and she wasn't going to neglect the daily manicuring of her nails: "I would never get to be the kind of woman that people look pityingly at their husbands and then say 'Oh, well, she's a good mother to his children.'" Very carefully she had made out a time budget which worked beautifully on paper, and might have worked equally well in practice if she hadn't suddenly found herself with two infants instead of the expected one. And, of course, she had to do all her own housework. But Dotty was a capable young person, and with the help of her excellent husband, who learned how to manage the bottle-warmer and how

This is the actual house built by Harold Cary following Mr. Ernest Flagg's money-saving suggestions.

Build a Home—save 33⅓%

The Architect who designed the famous Singer Building worked out a NEW IDEA for small homes.

Following closely the new Flagg method, Harold Cary, an inexperienced amateur, built the house shown above at a saving of 33⅓%. It has six rooms, two baths, a garage, hot-water heat, a real open fireplace and many unique features. Walls of solid masonry, fireproof partitions, composition floors, such as fine hotels use. It will still be standing 500 years from now unless intentionally torn down.

"To climb out of the old rute of house building requires nothing but a little daring," says Mr. Ernest Flagg, the brilliant architect who designed the Singer Building, the Corcoran Art Gallery at Washington, and the U. S. Naval Academy at Annapolis.

You can build a house like it and save a third—if you follow Mr. Flagg's method in his delightful little book, "BUILD A HOME AND SAVE A THIRD." Harold Cary tells in an interesting narrative style just how he built his attractive fireproof house. He gives you 36 drawings, sketches, photographs, including plans and costs and specifications.

This book might save you hundreds, perhaps thousands of dollars, if you contemplate building. And even if you are not about to build, you will be interested and entertained with Harold Cary's daily diary of his conquest of waste and delay

"Yours is the Earth and Everything that's in it"

IN HIS immortal poem, IF, Rudyard Kipling described his own works better than any one else ever has . . . the Earth and Everything that's in it.

He was not talking about himself, nor even about books, yet the phrase is a perfect description. For in the novels, poems, tales and essays of the Universal writer the whole vivid panorama of Life is pictured with the consummate artistry of a genius.

There is some one you wish to remember this Christmas, with a gift that means something more than money-value. There is some one to whom you would like to give the Earth, if you could. Here is your opportunity.

Here are weeks, yes, months of travel, travel in the strangest of lands, travel spiced with romance, colored by high adventure. Here is humor, pathos, love and hate and every human emotion pictured so clearly that the reader is never conscious of his own surroundings but is swept away in a turmoil of action. Here is the spray of the sea; the grandeur of mountain peaks and storm-torn skies; the hum and bustle of Oriental bazaars; the stillness of jungle nights. Here are the hearts of British Tommies—serving their King in a foreign land. Here is the answer to that age-old riddle—the eye of a native maid.

Truly, the scope of this gift is Universal! Its period of usefulness and entertainment unlimited. For the cold winter evening in a cozy armchair—Kipling is unsurpassed.

No other gift that money can buy will embrace all the advantages of a set of Rudyard Kipling. It will remain on your bookshelves through the years, always available, always new, a source of infinite pleasure, evidence of the taste of the giver and his regard for the recipient.

ill be one of the rare sources for nding this unique example of song. The section on "Early Miseries" ontains a number of those remarkble, naïve songs that bring diametically opposite emotion to listeners, epending on their temperament and iewpoint. These evoke tears on the ne hand and mocking mirth on the ther. Of such are "Only Me" and Why Did They Dig Ma's Grave So eep?" But this chapter also presents "Champagne Charlie" and the lassic "Casey Jones" to offset the seudo-sorrow.

It is in his "The Golden Age" secion that Mr. Spaeth tackled his ardest job and acquitted himself oll of a thorny and thankless winowing. This portion represents the rolific popular song period of the ast decade of the nineteenth cenury, when "Ta-ra-ra Boom-der-é" eaded the procession that included 'The Little Lost Child," "My Mother Was a Lady," "Two Little Girls in Blue," "After the Ball and "The Fatal Wedding."

For a lively evening we should like o watch a group made up of Thomas Edison, Judge Louis B. Hart through whose enthusiastic instrumentality the Buffalo library has acquired a wonderful collection of popular songs), William Delaney, Booth Tarkington and Fay Templeton listen to the contents of "Read 'Em and Weep" and hear their comments. For one thing, we know that Mr. Edison would point out many a lapse and particularly call attention to the omission of "I'll Take You Home Again, Kathleen," which has outsold all other of his phonograph records over a long period of steady demand. Mr. Delaney might regret the absence of "Down in the Coal Mine" and, if not too modest, the failure to even record by passing mention his own "Let Her Go, Gallagher!" which became a byword.

As a matter of fact, the present reviewer put the book to a test in a gathering that ranged in age from twenty-five to seventy. What the younger members missed could not be taken into account. But the older critics flung a multitude of titles at the head of the challenger which were not mentioned in the work. Among them were "Billy Boy," "Whispering Hope," "Swinging 'Neath the Shade of the Old Apple Tree," "Stick to Your Mother, Tom," "Sunday Night When the Parlor's Full," "Speak to Me, Speak," Whom, Emma!" and "Whisper Your Mother's Name."

And, really, the last one should have had a place in these delightful pages, for it is one of the choicest examples of the genre that Mr. Spaeth has garnered so well. It ranks beside "Take Back Your Gold," "She May Have Been Better Days" and "Just Tell Them That You Saw Me," and other gems of that lustre, which he has set and polished with his witty footnotes. F. P. A., whom the author follows so admiringly in the boundless field of popular songs, should have told him about it. Because it is so perfect a specimen of others that may have been excluded for exigent reasons, we quote a stanza and chorus for the appendix of the next edition:

I was seated one day
In a gilded café,
In a window that looked on the street;
When a face caught my eye
In the crowd passing by,
And I hastily sprang to my feet.
'Twas my sister's sad face
That I'd left home to trace,
Through pride she had left us one day,
And it brought back to me
Just as plain as could be,
My mother as I heard her say:
(Chorus)
If you should see your sister,
Do not reproach or blame,
Tell her how we have missed her,
Love her just the same—
My d-a-a-ar-ling—
Tell her these words you've brought her,
Whether in pride or shame,
Tell her she's still my daughter—
Whisper your mother's name!

At any rate, we are quite sure that when the peculiarly inspired American composer comes along who is destined to write the longed-for opera from native tunes, he will find Mr. Spaeth's book treasure trove. Meanwhile, it will delight a large audience of kindred spirits, individually and collectively.

By the Magic of Sabatini

A drunken major beats down a nunnery door, supposing he is bursting in the portals of a Dominican friary, and thereby confuses the pretty business of love and menaces the plot of the great Wellington. And a hot-headed Irish officer fights a duel at night in a Portuguese court yard against the regulations of the Army. His life is forfeit—yet he escapes. It's all in the thrilling drama of "The Snare."

. . . as we sit spellbound, transported to that past which lives only in Sabatini's mind—that glorious past more real, now, to us than dry history ever pictured it!

Only Sabatini has this power of giving to musty, historic fact this blazing, throbbing life. Only Sabatini can touch the dim figures of Danton, Marat and Robespierre with this light of reality, and make us shudder through the poignant terrors of the French Revolution. Only Sabatini can produce out of cold historian calm the courtiers of profligate Charles II so they crowd the very room around us, and set us to shaking dice with Fortune in company with Charles's favorite, the Duke of Buckingham. Here, in one man, is a great historical writer and a greater romancer. At last, Sabatini has come into his own!

Dumas had this same gift; yet it is unfair to Sabatini's genius to compare him to Dumas. Sabatini has a gift even more potent of making real those crises of history of which he writes. He has the narrative skill of Robert Louis Stevenson. But that glowing exuberance of style, that makes the modern romancer's work so entrancing, is all Sabatini's own.

Current Magazines

would seem safe to say that an author's first book, if his subsequent work survives the critics, could be bought with impunity. Collectors of modern books now have excellent bibliographies to guide them; these were entirely lacking when I first began to play the game. Some of these are monuments of bibliographical exactness, others are of errors all compact; but, good or bad, as Dr. Johnson says of dictionaries, the worst is better than none.

New York University will begin, on Jan. 1, 1927, the publication of a four-page weekly journal to be called New York. Harold de Wolf Fuller, formerly editor of The Nation and now Professor of Journalism at the university, will edit the paper. The new publication, according to Mr. Fuller, will be "neither a digest of news nor a digest of opinion. It will deal with the high points of the week's news and bring authoritative information to the discussion of problems which are engaging the attention of the intelligent citizen." A regular feature of the paper will be a systematic index of the best current plays, musical performances and art shows. Reviews of current books will be limited to fifty words for each book. An attempt will be made, by means of questions and brief answers, to reduce modern problems to their elements and to indicate present-day methods of approaching them. All the resources of New York University will be drawn upon in the interpretation of current events and tendencies.

Announcement is made of a new magazine of verse, Overtures, to be edited by Henry Harrison, editor and publisher of The Greenwich Village Quill. A. M. Sullivan, Louis Ginsberg and Gordon Lawrence will be associate editors. The magazine will measure nine by twelve inches and will contain sixteen pages of two columns each. It will be devoted to the publication of the best original poetry submitted to the editors; also to interviews with famous poets and editors, to reviews of new books of verse and on verse, and to important articles on poetry. Contributions are solicited, but will not be paid for. The editorial offices will be at 76 Elton Street, Brooklyn.

A second installment of the private letters of Joseph Conrad appears in the December issue of World's Work. Among the letters are two to R. B. Cunninghame Graham, in which Conrad gives his estimate of Rudyard Kipling. In the first of these two letters he writes:

Mr. Kipling has the wisdom of the passing generations—and holds it in perfect sincerity. Some of his work is of impeccable form and because of that little thing he will sojourn in Hell only a very short while. He squints with the rest of his excellent sort. It is a beautiful squint: it is an useful squint. And—after all—perhaps he sees around the corner? And supposes Truth is just around the corner like the elusive and useless loafer it is? I can't tell. No one can tell. It is impossible to know. It is impossible to know anything, though it is possible to believe a thing or two.

And in the second he continues as follows:

• • • You understand perfectly what I tried to say about Mr. Kipling—but I did not succeed in saying exactly what I wanted to say. I wanted to say, in effect, that in the chaos of printed matter Kipling's "flauchés" appear by contrast finished and impeccable. I judge the man in his time—and space. It is a small space, and as to his time, I leave it to your tender mercy. I wouldn't in his defense spoil the small amount of steel that goes to the making of a needle. As to posterity it won't smile. Not it! Posterity will be busy thieving, lying, selling its small soul for sixpence (from the noblest motives) and will remember no one, except perhaps one or two quite too atrocious mountebanks; and the half-dozen men lost in that bazarre are more likely to weep than to smile over these masterpieces of our time.

A PERFECT CHRISTMAS GIFT

EVERYBODY'S PEPYS

For the first time the standard Wheatley version of PEPYS' DIARY (formerly available only in 3 vols., $15) in one volume, with 60 full-page illustrations by E. H. Shepard. $3.50

Meet Mr. Pepys—!

Jan. 1, 1662—"Waking this morning out of my sleep on a sudden, I did with my elbow hit my wife a great blow over her face and nose, which waked her with pain, at which I was sorry, and to sleep again."

July 9th, 1663—"Abroad, it raining, to Blackfriars, and there went into a little alehouse, and here I kissed three or four times the maid of the house, who is a pretty girl but very modest."

Samuel Pepys was born in 1633, the son of a tailor, graduated from Magdalene College, Cambridge, and married when he was 22 and his wife 15, with not a penny between them. For years he was Secretary of the Admiralty. In appearance he was a smallish man, bright-eyed, and sprucely dressed—"Dapper Dickey", he signed himself to Mrs. Knipp. He had an astonishing physical energy and industry, and a marked susceptibility to feminine charms. "His name is never mentioned without a twinkle . . . an implication that we are all like that at bottom, and that his Diary is the kind we should all keep if we were honest with ourselves."

"Everybody's Pepys will be successful immediately as an apt Christmas present."—The Saturday Review of Literature.

Of Shepard's drawings: "Whether he is shown sitting, outwardly decorous, at prayers with his wife and a demure maid or two, or kissing ladies on the stairs for forfeits, he is the real, the human Pepys that we know and love."—N. Y. Herald Tribune.

Wild Bill Hickok

THE PRINCE OF PISTOLEERS

By FRANK J. WILSTACH

SINGLE-HANDED he tamed Abilene and Hays City in their roughest, toughest cow town days . . . dealt death in the McCandles fight . . . duelled with three cowboys at once. He was the deadliest gunman of the West. Tradition ascribes to him seventy-five victims. Yet he never fired a shot save on the side of law and order.

After sixty years of legend the thrilling facts of his amazing life are caught up in a spirited biography.

"TWENTY-ONE years as crowded and lusty with adventure as any mother's son ever lived. . . . Wild Bill was the handsomest figure of a man that ever sat astride a horse or fanned a gun or kept a private cemetery."
N. Y. Sun.

"IF Wild Bill ever falls into the hands of the Boy Scouts—old or young—they will dash through it like the Twentieth Century passing Oscawana."
Philadelphia Inquirer.

Notes on Rare Books

THE participation of nearly a score of private owners in the Anderson Galleries' auction, to be held Dec. 16, has resulted in a sale catalogue of challenging interest. We think that the real thrill provided by this curious entertainment comes at the end, in the historic Bayntun collection of naval documents. This, states the cataloguer:

> is the most astonishing discovery of its kind for many years, and will be of profound interest to all collectors and libraries. It contains historic documents, particularly those connected with Nelson and Collingwood, that are probably unique; and there is much matter of direct American relevance. No such documents are in the British Admiralty, the British Museum, or any institution in Europe or anywhere else.

Perhaps the most astonishing phase of the Nelson collection is that none of these letters are addressed to Lady Hamilton.

But this is really a most exciting group of historical records, the finest of which appears to be a sheet of pendants and order of sailing for Trafalgar, with the pendants colored by hand, signed twice in full by Nelson. There are others of the greatest dramatic significance, such as Nelson's letters and orders to Bayntun; the famous secret memorandum of Oct. 9, giving in five folio pages an inimitable exposition of naval tactics to be carried out in the coming battle; a considerable group of letters and documents centring about Trafalgar, including an "Order of Battle" signed by Nelson. Another one of these, curiously enough, was sold by the American Art Association in its miscellaneous sale Dec. 2. It was addressed to Sir Tho. Livingston of the Renommée, apparently a frigate which, according to Bayntun's notes and scorings on his copy of the "Order of Battle," was not in the engagement at Trafalgar.

This is but one division of this sale of two hundred lots, in which are flourished such inviting objects as a cutlass owned by Washington; a self-portrait of Stevenson, autographed, in a copy of Catriona; Conrad's original manuscript of "The Return"; the autograph transcription of Lincoln's famous speech on slavery and the Union, with a certification in his own hand, &c. We appreciate the fact that even for an auction sale this is a rare and unusual commingling of "literary" properties. Nor it that all. There is a letter of Burns in a serious vein; one from Washington to Thomas Paine; printed and manuscript Horae; manuscripts of O. Henry; an incunabule or two, of which one is the very rare Apuleius, printed at Rome by Sweynheim and Pannartz in 1469; Elizabethan literature; Americana; Roosevelt's autograph review of Mahan's "Influence of Sea Power"; several fine autograph manuscripts of Lafcadio Hearn, of which the best appears to be the complete manuscript of "Kitzuki," illustrated, &c. Surely diversity in entertainment for book(!) collectors can go no further.

In the annals of Bibliomania there have been a few—a very few—eccentrics who might with justice be "doomed for a certain term to walk the night," notably those traitors to Shakespeare, John Payne Collier and William Henry Ireland. But to open the tomb and conjure forth the "canonized bones" of the Rev. Thomas Frognall Dibdin, D. D., suited perfectly the purpose of our sagacious poet. Field wanted news from the "jasper sea" as well as from the other "dreadful place," so he worked his incantation upon an orthodox divine who, having written two volumes of sermons, most indubitably went to Heaven when he died. Besides, Dr. Dibdin, in spite of being a book collector, was quite happily married, and therefore an impartial witness.

Furthermore, Field knew that Dibdin would prove a tractable ghost, for in life Thomas Frognall was the soul of amiability and good temper. It is true that in the "Noctes Ambrosianae" William Maginn called him "Blackletter Fogrum Dibdin," but that was politics. It must be admitted, too, that Macready went to call on Dr. Dibdin, took umbrage at something or other, and to repeat his own quotation, "marched out by moonlight wearily." But Macready was always doing that sort of thing, carefully recording it afterward in his "exhaustive and exhausting" Diaries. As against these, consider some of Dr. Dibdin's friends—Sir Walter Scott, Daniel Maclise, George Chalmers, Edmund Malone, Thomas Warton, Joseph Ritson, the younger Boswell, Richard Heber, Sir Egerton Brydges and Earl Spencer.

WE acknowledge with the profoundest regret our failure to notice in these columns the recent auction of a "batch of books" owned by Mr. A. Edward Newton and sold by the Anderson Galleries. The excuse for this, if there can be any excuse, is that we received the catalogue of the sale too late, and even had we received it earlier we lacked the space.

But a literary and commercial event of such importance may not, of course, be lightly disregarded, and we hasten to make what amends we can. These books were announced as Mr. Newton's duplicates—sometimes, indeed, his quintuplicates—and the sale itself labeled "The Books of a Busted Bibliophile."

Thomas J. Gannon, booksellers of New York City, have just issued a little catalogue of rare books, containing first editions, Americana, Press Books, &c. Many of these are of perennial interest, such as the first English Gomara, 1578; the first issue of Lamb's "Tales From Shakespeare"; first editions of Bryant, Byron, Conrad, Kipling and Stevenson: the rare Rowlandson plates to Roderick Random, 1800, &c. These will serve to indicate the nature of the material offered through this catalogue.

All Kinds of People

ALTHOUGH little or no excuse need be offered for reprinting so excellent a poem as "Dibdin's Ghost," from the lively pen of our own Eugene Field, a happy combination of reasons is provided by the fact that it has been done by John Henry Nash of San Francisco (250 copies for John S. Drum), with a delightful introduction by Edward F. O'Day. We do not think we have seen any essays of Mr. O'Day's before, and this, "On Deprecating Certain Weaknesses of Wives," is excellent and calls for more. Mr. O'Day, in bookish essays, may be described as a disciple of the earlier Newtonian manner. And Newton is not the same gentleman who became famous because a large red apple rebounded from his head—or for some such reason.

"Dibdin's Ghost" is fairly well known, and we need not raise it again here; but Mr. Nash's production is new and may be acknowledged as an extremely attractive piece of work. We may be permitted—in the casual manner of reporters—to quote one excerpt from Mr. O'Day's' essay, because of its reference to the subject of Field's poem. But on the whole his preface deserves consideration as a whole; it is excellently well knit and it is a most valuable introduction to an entertaining book.

It was characteristic of Eugene Field's Pucklike humor [writes Mr. O'Day] to make a revenant of Dibdin. Steamboat Days tribution to the little-known history of America. Lovers of Americana will like it. The photographs of steamboats, with which the book is illustrated, leave much to be desired.

The average Easterner's and Northerner's knowledge of Western river steamboating has been got from Mark Twain's delightful but wholly misleading epic of piloting on the Mississippi. His "Life on the Mississippi" was misleading (ask any old river man!) because the author presented a distorted view of the subject, canonizing the river pilot to the detriment of everything and everybody else. Mark Twain said that steamboating was dead in 1882. Yet in 1880, the official records show, steamboats on Western rivers carried more than six million passengers and heaven knows how much freight. Still, by comparison with what the total was in the '50s and '60, steamboating was a trifle anemic.

But there has lately been a revival of interest in steamboat matters. And Mr. Quick's book is one more evidence of the fact. Common carriers in the form of modern stern-wheel steamboats and big barges, installed by the Government during the war, are now rendering fine service on the Mississippi, and the service is shortly to be extended to the Ohio. In fact, steamboating never entirely died out. There are still a few of the old-time passenger packets in operation on the Mississippi, the Ohio, the Cumberland, the Kanawha and others of the Western system. Great fleets of coal, in barges covering acres of area, are towed down the river every few days from Charleston and Pittsburgh to the Southern cities.

Out in St. Louis there is even a magazine published solely in the interest of Western river steamboating. It is the Waterways Journal, which for forty years (even during the time it seemed that steamboating, passenger and freight, was gone for good and all) has hammered into the ears of its readers the fact that steamboating is not dead but only sleeping.

Last year Fred Erving Dayton's "Steamboat Days" was published by Stokes. Dayton's book was all right in its way. But as the Irishman said about the mule, "Dom such ways!" Dayton devoted something like 400 pages to a chronological listing of steamboats of the "Down East" type—the kind that ply the Hudson and the Coast waters. He relegated to a short, incorrect chapter of about twenty pages the entire question of Western river steamboating. And this in spite of the fact that the steamboats which plied between New Orleans and the upriver cities carried a greater commerce than the entire deep-water traffic of the United States and Great Britain combined!

Last year, also, there was republished an old river epic known as "Forty Years a Gambler on the Mississippi" by George Devol. And this year Edna Ferber, feeling the lure of the Western rivers, went out to the Mississippi and got her setting for "Show Boat." Besides, there are appearing frequently in a well-known periodical stories of gambling on the river boats, from the pen of the astute Harris Dickson of Vicksburg.

All of which points to a return of interest in the subject of steamboating in the West. Mr. Quick's book, however, is the first serious attempt at anything like a correct account of steamboating. And even, yet the surface has hardly been scratched.

To this reviewer, who was "fotch up" within sound of the mellow flutings of steamboat whistles, and whose earliest recollection is of a trip from Charleston, W. Va., to Cincinnati and Louisville on Commodore F. A. Laidley's Henry M. Stanley, in one of the earlier Bryan campaigns, Herbert Quick's book, "Mississippi Steamboatin'" comes both as a pleasure and a disappointment. A pleasure because here at last is a largely authentic history of Western river steamboating. A disappointment, because so much of the color and dialect and incident that was a part of those old steamboating days is conspicuous by its absence.

DR. MORTON PRINCE and Upton Sinclair, who debate the question, "Shall We Abolish Intercollegiate Football?" in the December Forum, agree that something should be done about the game, but neither of them goes so far as to advocate its abolition. Mr. Sinclair, who can always be trusted to find that the "interests" are back of anything that is not as it should be, sees in intercollegiate football as it is played today a gigantic conspiracy to keep college students from thinking. His argument is that thinking must inevitably lead to the overthrow of capitalism and that to prevent such a catastrophe the capitalists who control the boards of trustees and the alumni associations of our colleges have deliberately conspired to build huge arenas, pay enormous salaries to coaches and, in general, to work up such a state of excitement about football that it shall occupy the minds of the students to the exclusion of everything else. A neat little scheme, is it not? Mr. Sinclair's remedy is: First, to abolish all gate receipts and apportion football tickets among the students; second, to reduce the salary of the coach to the level of that of the lowest paid instructor; and, third, to substitute for athletic contests in which eleven men do all the work mass contests to include all students who are not physically incapacitated. There cannot be the slightest doubt that these remedies would purge football of its present evils. Whether they would make the students think is another question.

Dr. Prince is not quite so drastic. He, too, thinks that intercollegiate football under existing conditions is more of a business than a sport and that it attracts attention quite beyond its deserts. But his remedy is much simpler. All he asks is that the game be handed back to the boys, that is, that the game be played by the boys, not by the coaches. The problems of tickets and gate receipts, he believes, would take care of themselves, for the reason that there would be no such enormous football crowds as we have today. The game would become what it was originally, a contest between students of rival colleges and of interest only to the students and a few of their friends. Furthermore, it would, in Dr. Prince's opinion, be a more interesting game to the players for the reason that they would be doing their own thinking, instead of merely obeying instructions transmitted to them from the sidelines. Whether this sort of thinking might result in the overthrow of the capitalistic system, Dr. Prince does not say.

A. Edward Newton, who has been collecting books for forty years, writes in the December Atlantic Monthly on "This Book Collecting Game." The word "game" is admittedly used in its present colloquial sense, but it is evident that Mr. Newton really does look upon book collecting as a game, and a most fascinating one at that, for he says of it:

> Book collecting is a great sport; every day new players are joining in the game; we amateurs are playing it against professionals, and sometimes it costs us money, but not so much as one might suppose. To play against Dr. Rosenbach is like trying to break the bank at Monte Carlo; yet even he has sold me items which he would now take off my hands at three or four times what I paid for them. A rare book should, and usually does, advance in value, but it is a good deal more fun to anticipate the rise than to buy it at a high price after it has risen. There are thousands of excellent books by important authors which will never be "collected," for the reason that the first edition was so large. The books to collect are those the success of which was at one time problematical, or those which the subsequent work of an author has made important: these constantly rise in value. Of books of yesterday: de la Mare's "Songs of Childhood," Masefield's "Salt Water Ballads," Housman's "Shropshire Lad," Sheila Kaye-Smith's "Tramping Methodist," Morley's "Parnassus on Wheels," keep on advancing in price, to the bewilderment of their authors. How long they will hold their present value, or whether they will go still higher, nobody knows; but it from first to last his aim of portraying the influence of Athens upon the commercial world, Mr. Calhoun has contrived to so imbue his subject with life that we see not only Athens but her great citizens clothed in luminous array of virtue and patriotism. In the chapters on "The Course of Economic Evolution" a beautifully clear presentation is given of the Minoan civilisation, passing thence to the period of aristocratic government, to the rise of the laboring classes, the period of freebooting with all its dire consequences, the author carries us along to the usually dry matter of banks and mining with a pleasant lightness which proves him perfect master of his subject. He is an artist in words, otherwise we should not have had such genre bits as the fetching story about Pisistratus and the poor farmer. The husbandman was toiling to turn up his poor, rocky soil when the monarch, passing by, desired to know what he could raise on such wretched ground. "Nothing but aches and pains, and of these Pisistratus must have his tithe." Struck with the wit of the reply, Pisistratus remitted the taxes of this special farmer for all time. Personages come and go, leaving their fadeless pictures to remind us of old Athens in "her glory and her shame." Seldom does one come across so small a volume containing so much wealth.

NEWSPAPER ADVERTISING

THE ATTENTION VALUE OF NEWSPAPER ADVERTISEMENTS. By Richard B. Franken. The Association of National Advertisers.

EXACTLY where and how to place your advertisement is one of the useful pieces of information to be gleaned from this manual. The author pleasantly alludes to the popular fallacy that anything that starts out with a theory must be unpractical. On the contrary, all good things begin with a theory. So, his canter into this very practical field has its impetus in his idea that the application of psychology to business methods would vastly increase efficiency. The book is profusely illustrated with cuts, showing the comparative value of certain placings, and the wit of catching a casual reader's eye by some grotesque yet appropriate bit of photography. Tables are given of comparative values of positions in the newspapers, &c. As a manual for the business man whose interest lies in happy advertising the book, or rather booklet, has its distinct use.

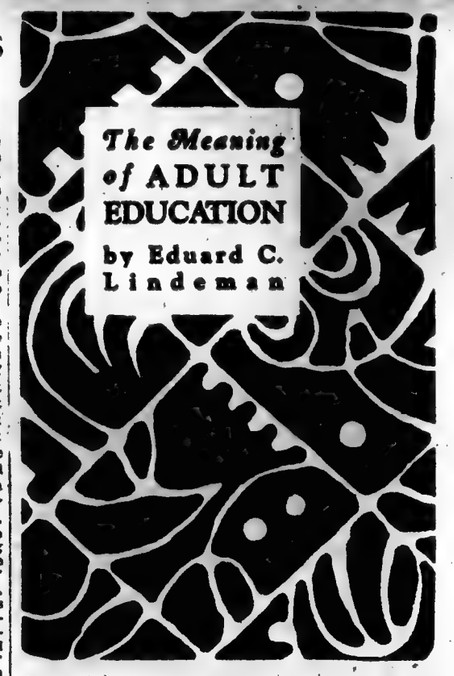
A RELIGIOUS ANTHOLOGY

ANTHOLOGY OF JESUS. Edited and arranged by Sir James Marchant, K. B. E., LL.D. New York: Harper & Bros. $3.50.

THE very pages of this anthology breathe reverence, seriousness, devotion. Every great prophet and founder of religions has had his passionate biographers. But the unique factor in anything that has ever dealt with Jesus is an almost awful sense of the constraining impulsion toward the utmost truth. Here, in this very beautiful series of compilations, this one strain runs through. One feels the truth, the straightforwardness of the whole text. The editor has gathered together such a splendid volume of testimony about the Saviour of men that the worst skeptic, the most indifferent reader must be the better, the happier, for perusing it. Of course the strong appeal will be to the religious mind. Like all beautiful moral expositions, it will be most eagerly adopted by the class least in need of its teaching. But the work has been well and faithfully done. And, coming at this season, when all the air is full of the thrill of Christ's coming, it must be considered a welcome visitor to all households where faith, love and duty are still held to be the foundation of right conduct.

An exhibit of the original paintings made by Dean Cornwell for "The City of the Great King" (Cosmopolitan Book Corporation) will be held at the Grand Central Art Galleries, New York City, from Dec. 9 to Dec. 24. The pictures displayed will include both the canvases in oil and the water-color sketches made by Mr. Cornwell in the Holy Land last year. One of the latter was hung in the Royal Academy this Spring.

The fifteenth annual appeal for the One Hundred Neediest Cases appears today in Section 8. Read it.



THE association of Mr. Lindeman's book with The New Republic is not accidental. For twelve years this paper has pleaded the cause of Adult Education. It has provided during that time a weekly bill-of-fare for minds that wished to go on growing. Many of the far-reaching changes recently occurring in the habits of American thought are of its making. It will continue as it began—a ferment in the public mind, a thorn in the side of complacency.

If you are not now a subscriber, and would like to receive the magazine for a six-month period, you may secure it in combination with, The Meaning of Adult Education, for what the book alone might well have cost if published in any other format—i. e., for $3.00. The price of the magazine is regularly $5.00 a year.

ONE might think there were already enough different kinds of education.

There's pre-school and there's primary, elementary and secondary, college and post-grad. It sounds plenty and so it used to seem. Once labeled A. B., the proud graduate was "educated." He was equipped for life, his mental suitcase packed for the whole journey.

But of late we have shown a decent unwillingness to regard ourselves as finished at twenty-two. Face to face with our ignorance, we have wondered why we were not supposed to go on learning. Why, in short, education should be thought of as having either a beginning or an end — why it should not mean simply observing, thinking, living, and being.

A highly qualified person has just written an instructive little book about these newer ideas. He is Eduard C. Lindeman, author of Social Discovery, and his book called, The Meaning of Adult Education, is published in the New Republic DOLLAR SERIES. It is the most readable volume imaginable, packed with mature experience and written out of a full mind. It will be useful to everyone whose education is not yet ended.

To secure it please fill in the blank below. The book will come to you post-haste and postpaid.

IS IT GOD'S WORD?
By Joseph Wheless

Mr. Wheless calls his book "An exposition of the fables and mythology of the Bible and of the impostures of theology."

Rupert Hughes says of it: "The book is so full of vital information, so fascinatingly expressed, that every member of our so-called Christian civilization ought to read it, ought to be afraid not to read it. It is a book, indeed, which the honest and sincere believer dares not avoid." $5.00

THE DECLINE OF THE WEST
By Oswald Spengler

Propounding the theory that civilization is discontinuous and impermanent—that every epoch rises, declines and disappears—this book is itself epoch-making. It is the most important work in the philosophy of history that has come out of Germany, or indeed out of Europe, for years. $6.00 check by taboos, are to get their chance.

Moralists, Too

This book is the celebration of the down-trodden sex with man held up to malicious and choice ridicule. It is thoroughly exposed that he is a very imperfect animal. In "The New Immorality" it is shown how he is even to be shorn of his capacity—his corner you might say—on vice. The fact that Sappho, Cleopatra, Lucrezia Borgia, George Sand and Xanthippe found means to express themselves in the past, means nothing compared to the new freedom. Mrs. Seabury makes the startling discovery that "it is only in recent years that magnificently wicked and dangerous women have had the freedom of the stage." In her advocacy of Mrs. Jezebel, we would have Mrs. Seabury pause and reflect upon Don Herold's remark that "A girl who has not gone barefoot in early childhood is apt to take up classic dancing along toward middle life—and that is not the time to answer the call of the wild." While we are greatly stimulated by these sketches of the new freedom for women, we also take great comfort in the knowledge that in this new-found vigor, women will naturally fight out the next war in the trenches, while the men do the heavy cheering and wrap up the bandages. Before passing out of Mrs. Seabury's life, however, we should like to point out a mere contradiction in her ample view of wondrous feminism. After claiming the superiority of women on the subject of maternity, she belittles her puppet, the Professional Understander, with derision when she makes him remark that "Maternity is the one experience all women long for, because they know they cannot share it with men." If she had only remarked, "I contradict myself, very well then, I contradict myself," we would have understood. There is nothing left to do but bow our head * * * we can hope it doesn't become prevalent in our lifetime.

This brings us battered, but persevering, to Corey Ford, who last adapted the Rollo Boys for modern usage. "The Gazelle's Ears" has more variety than his former volume. It has the crazy humor, the nonsense and the happy burlesque so frequently found in college magazines of humor. In his genial discussion of Christmas gifts, telephones, bicycles, encyclopedias, the ovis poli and bees and the usual merits of the people at large and confined, Mr. Ford displays a more robust gayety than in his former volume. He has some gift for broad characterization, a gusto, a true merriment. His parodies are unusually good. But what he doesn't know about feminism would fill his book. The same is true of "A Cocktail Continentale" by Reynolds. Here is a man who has gone wise-cracking about three continents, when all the time he could have stayed at home and had a new world revealed to him. Everything to be seen and drunk in Europe is in this book. Its raciness is attractive and its broad comments pleasing, if taken in small doses. Otherwise it is a bit of a strain to laugh over such well-worked subjects and retold jests. And don't, dear reader, take these books all on at once; the world is mad enough without it.

William Butler Yeats, the Irish poet, is a printer as well as a writer of books, though he publishes no editions of more than 500 copies. He has brought out books by Lady Gregory, Lord Dunsany, Katharine Tynan and other Irish writers, and some of his own work as well, through the Cuala Press, in Dublin. This is a branch of the Cuala Industries run by the Yeats family. One of the poet's sisters is in charge of the embroidery department of the industries, which makes artistic table linens, while another manages the hand press, whose publications W. B. Yeats edits. His brother, Jack Butler Yeats of the Royal Hibernian Academy, designs the hand-colored prints which are a by-product of the firm. The Macmillan Company is bringing out the sixth volume of the collected works of W. B. Yeats under the title, "Autobiographies: Reveries Over Childhood and Youth, and The Trembling of the Veil."

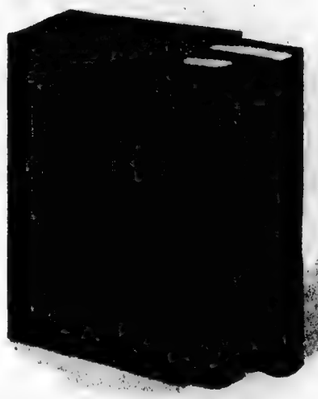
Translated by DOROTHY CANFIELD FISHER

Originally published in March, 1923, Papini's "Life of Christ" met with immediate recognition as one of the most moving and vivid accounts of the Saviour's Life that have ever been written. Today, more than three and a half years later, its passionate pages still hold a message for our modern world. From the old, old story Papini has cut away the layers of embellishment with which the picture of Christ's life and times has hitherto been obscured, and he writes with a simplicity that makes the story clear to every mind.

HARCOURT, BRACE AND COMPANY 383 Madison Avenue New York



A Review by George Jean Nathan

"AS I say, form is lacking, but if there is a writer in America today who can lay hold of mean people and mean lives and tear their mean hearts out with more appalling realism, his work is unknown to me. . . . When Tully approaches a character, he approaches that character's soul only after he has first ripped off the last shred of his undershirt . . . and what is more, he gets smashing effects legitimately."

LOVE—LIFE IN NATURE

The Story of the Evolution of Love

By WILHELM BOLSCHE

THIS monumental masterpiece, which has sold over 150,000 copies in Germany, now becomes available to the adults of America. It has long been regarded as the standard book on its subject in all European countries. Written in the lyric style of Maeterlinck's Life of the Bee, it constitutes a fascinating narrative of the evolution of love as the great cosmic force in all life. Two volumes, boxed, $10.00

JOSEPH C. LINCOLN'S FINEST NOVEL

THE BIG MOGUL

JOSEPH C. LINCOLN is a novelist who never disappoints. He writes of America for Americans, of sturdy, honest village people, their romances, their bigness, their pettiness, their knotty problems and the queer vagaries of fortune and comic absurdities that come into their daily lives. His books bring sunshine and laughter and wholesome entertainment into the hearts and homes of hundreds of thousands each year.

THIS YEAR Lincoln has surpassed himself. "The Big Mogul" is his best book. It is the story of a headstrong, selfish, autocratic, generous, lovable, village tyrant, his family, his friends and his enemies. A story of delightful people that gains steadily in suspense as its unusual plot unfolds. Plenty of hearty laughs, too, as might be expected from the author of "Shavings," "Cap'n Eri," "Doctor Nye," etc.

The Man Who Keeps All America in Good Humor.

Critics unite in praising "The Big Mogul" as Lincoln at his very best

"A real and a very interesting creation."—N. Y. Times.

"Deserves a million readers."—Boston Herald.

"Rich in the most sympathetic kind of human understanding."—Buffalo Times.

"The Big Mogul' is about as good as a book can be."—Hartford Courant.

"He has never written anything but a good story and he has never had anything short of a multitude of readers. Furthermore, his popularity is deserved."—Boston Transcript.

"A book worth reading . . . deals with characters which may be found in most any community."—Dallas Times-Herald.

"It will be read and enjoyed by those who hold fast to the Dickens tradition."—Philadelphia Public Ledger.

"Humorous, often dramatic. . . . Capital reading."—Indianapolis News.

"He is a writer on intimate terms with his readers and they love him."—N. Y. Herald Tribune.

"Vivid and enthralling . . . will delight thousands."—Portland Oregonian.

"If Mr. Lincoln ever produced a character more real than Foster Townsend we have failed to discover him."—Cincinnati Enquirer.

"A real drama . . . one of the best stories of the year."—Atlanta Constitution.

"Leaves the reader with something deeper than merely the pleasant afterglow of a few hours interestingly spent."—Philadelphia Record.

"Characters as vital and memorable as any Mr. Lincoln has created."—Literary Digest Book Review.

"The interest increases up to the last page. First rate entertainment."—Rochester Democrat Chronicle.

"The Big Mogul" will solve your Christmas Gift Problems

You can send "The Big Mogul" as a Christmas gift to anyone from seventeen to ninety, and be certain that it will be treasured. Booksellers report that many people buy Lincoln's novels by the dozen for gift purposes. This year the publishers have printed record-size editions, in anticipation of the great demand. These books are in the hands of booksellers in every part of America. The price is $2.00 a copy. Place your order with your bookseller today.

RAMBLES WITH ANATOLE FRANCE

By Sándor Kémeri

—His Last Secretary and Confidante.

Translated from the Hungarian by Emil Lengyel

Introduction by Paul-Louis Couchoud

Here is a journey that will become memorable in literary annals, adding fresh association to already famous shrines. Never has the personal charm of Anatole France been felt as in this book of his enthusiasms.

"Anatole France to the Life"
—EMILE HENRIOT in Le Temps

New York Times Book Review:
"A book which admirers of M. Bergeret (Anatole France) cannot quite afford to miss. Here are revelations—even homely revelations. Mme. Kemeri does not merely cull his wise saws, his sprightly sallies, the barbs of his wit and the audacities of his skilfull tongue. She takes notes even of his banalities. Probably her Anatole France is more like than Brousson's Anatole France."

Philadelphia Public Ledger:
"Sandor Kemeri saw him with the eyes of the poet—his great white head against the sky. She knew the profound scholar, the immortal artist, glorified by years, facing the dread and promise of death—a moving, dramatic figure before all beauty, before all life. A deeper than surface picture. Like Mr. Paine's last volume in his life of Mark Twain, in which the human being stands clear, unhampered by the pettier concerns of his youth. The glamour of his presence is over the pages of this book."

petent performer. Starting with Corelli, he brings us to the noted musicians of the nineteenth century in a sort of running comment, which is agreeable and not at all fatiguing to the memory. Emphasising rather the "human side" of musicians than their publicity, he touches intimately upon the foibles and virtues of hundreds of personages—Scarlatti, Schumann, Rossini, Haydn, Bach, Czerny—leaping from one to the other without regard to the nationality, the thread of sequence being that of epoch. It is a brilliant panorama, light and cheerful, and should take its place among the valued works of the musician's library.

BRITISH SLAVERY

BRITISH SLAVERY AND ITS ABOLITION. By William Law Mathieson. 318 pp. London and New York: Longmans, Green & Co. $6.

IF there had never been a sugar industry there might have been no slavery. From the West Indies to the Guianas and Cuba slavery spread like a foul disease, and all the world of dainty whites fattened on the sweat of Africa. Wilberforce opened his campaign for the abolition of slavery in 1787, but was met by the storm of protestors who swore that the slaves were far better off in a condition of servitude than they had been in the jungles of their own country. In all the thrilling chapters of this fine book we have laid off in consecutive order the history of this lovely improvement of the original status of the blacks under Spanish, French, Dutch and British rule. Strange to see, the system of Spain was less cruel than that of the merciless Dutch or the cold English. Going to the psychological root of the thing, Spaniards have ever been indifferent to monetary values, and it was upon the basis of greed that slavery had its start. Logically, then, the Dutch and the English drove harder, lashed their slaves more crually in the pursuit of gain. When the system of apprenticeship, or pretended hiring, came into play it seemed for a time that many abuses would be stopped, but apprenticeship did not accomplish what its humane sponsor, Spencer, hoped for it. France away back in 1689 had attempted something in the way of amelioration of the more glaring abuses through the famous code noir of Louis XIV, but just as that fell down so did the efforts of British philanthropists fall down until the big Anti-Slavery Society, with Lushington and Buxton at its head, fairly forced upon the reluctant Britain the radical measure of actual emancipation, and presently we have the wonderful scene at Spanish Town, when the hysterically happy blacks, their chains finally broken, walked through the streets cheering for Queen Victoria. All this is vividly related in this splendid book.

A SOUTH AMERICAN HERO

JUSTO RUFFINO BARRIOS. By Pchal Burgess, A. B., B. D., Ph. D. 286 pp. New York: Dorrance & Co. $3.

BARRIOS may stand "for a cause," as his biographer insists that he did and does, but he stood so fiercely, so vindictively and with such typically Spanish bias in favor of his personal ambitions as weighed against the general welfare of lesser persons that no pathetic apologies can persuade us that he merits in the least being compared with our Lincoln or our Roosevelt, patriots both. This book is written in an involved style, confusing to follow, scarcely worthy the flamboyant preface that claims for it a complete history of the achievement of Guatemalan independence. It is by no means difficult to conceive a situation in which Guatemala, insignificant as she appears, might by her friendship save the United States or by going over to the enemy prove our undoing. Mr. Burgess endeavors to clarify his difficult subject, for somehow everything that deals with this turbulent domain becomes immediately lost in mists by leaving Barrios from time to time to give us brief bits of general history. He treats of the political history of Guatemala, the expulsion of the Jesuits, of relations with foreign lands, and so on; but he fails to hold our interest. Perhaps Mr. Burgess's talent lies rather in the field of drama than of history.

ATHENIAN BUSINESS LIFE

THE BUSINESS LIFE OF ANCIENT ATHENS. By George Calhoun. 170 pp. The University of Chicago Press. $3.

THE author modestly terms this charming volume "a collection of little sketches, hastily written in leisure moments." The example of all that a comprehensive, philosophical historian should be, the late John W. Draper, might have been proud to father it. Keeping distinctly in view arianism became the teaching of the school. The theological school of the Congregationalists was the seminary at Andover, where, before the turn of the century, attendance had been steadily dwindling. If the reviewer is correct, Phillips Academy wished to expand and offered to purchase the seminary property. President Eliot thereupon invited the Andover theologians to combine with the Harvard Divinity School, an offer which was accepted. Eliot himself was a Unitarian, but he insisted the enlarged theological department should be non-sectarian! To most persons there would seem to be something of a logical contradiction here; yet the experiment seems to have been at least fairly successful.

Charles W. Eliot

It is a matter of regret that the Cotton biography is not a more impressive piece of work. As a running handbook it is well enough, and this in spite of many typographical inaccuracies, and some few inaccuracies as to fact. These last, however, are probably traceable to careless proofreading, as when, for example, the name of President Eliot's first wife is given as Ellen Derby instead of Ellen Derby Peabody, and when, in an illustration, Harvard Hall is designated as Hollis Hall.

It may be that Dr. Eliot is not one of whom compelling biography can be written. He was, as every one who knew him or even saw him was aware, a man of rarely penetrable austerity. When Sargent undertook to paint his portrait the result was scarcely better than failure. Eliot was not a person who lent himself to portraiture on canvas.

For those who wish to get a more complete picture of the man, and a fuller understanding of his extraordinary mentality, the collection of President Eliot's writings edited by President Neilson furnished rich provision. It was necessary, of course, that this collection should have been as voluminous as it is; one would not have it otherwise. At the same time this abundance will work against the books in one important field—that of the American essay. It would be well for the history of American letters if Dr. Neilson would winnow from this vast store—or have the winnowing done under his supervision—a small volume of selections. President Eliot wrote in a somewhat formal style, to be sure, but when any consideration is given to the more formal manners of writing, to such essayists, say, as Bacon, Sir Thomas Browne and Cardinal Newman, Dr. Eliot's contributions may not be neglected.

Bob Davis

goods for this, and once more rescue little Ruby from certain death?

The big story will be handed in Monday for you to try on the piano. From next week on I'll show you a story every week. I'm going to make some of the best samples of 2,000 to 2,500 word stuff that's possible. That's the length that counts.

I'm feeling fine, and I hope these lines will—say, don't forget to send the $25.

Don't do it if you refuse to do it.

Yours ever,
O. H.

But the story promised in this letter did not appear on the following Monday. When Davis called to inquire about it, O. Henry replied:

Going fine! Got a great start. I could sit down any time and finish it.

Here is the rest of the story as Davis tells it:

"Can I read the first page?"

"Certainly, old sock, here's the manuscript."

He tossed me a sheaf of yellow Manila paper, the first page of which contained the numeral 1 and the title. Before I had time to expostulate, he gently took the sheet from my hand and continued:

"And what's more, I can go right on with this story, without the least effort. You have already seen Page One. Now here's the second page."

With marvelous deliberation he wrote "Page 2" on the next sheet.

"And so on. Page 3, 4, 5. I think I will stop here, if you don't mind, and rest."

It is not a connected story that Bob Davis tells. Each chapter of his book stands by itself, relating some episode that has lingered in the author's memory.

ELLEN GLASGOW

—said Stuart P. Sherman— "is the brainiest woman in the South." Her most famous novels are Virginia and Barren Ground and her books have won her a place among the three or four leading American novelists. Her new novel, THE ROMANTIC COMEDIANS, is said by the critics to be "the most brilliant novel of the year."

A READER'S CHART

SELECTED by the BOOK-OF-THE-MONTH CLUB as the outstanding novel of November (the selecting Committee consisted of HEYWOOD BROUN, HENRY SEIDEL CANBY, DOROTHY CANFIELD, CHRISTOPHER MORLEY and WILLIAM ALLEN WHITE) Ellen Glasgow's new novel THE ROMANTIC COMEDIANS is now the most discussed book of the year. Select the quality you admire most in a novel, as shown on the chart below, and see how your favorite critic applies it to this particular book.

'witty'

CHRISTOPHER MORLEY
Novelist and Critic
"Miss Glasgow's novel is one of those phenomena curiously rare in America, a really witty book . . . It contains also the most cunningly amusing 'line' in recent fiction, which I should not dream of quoting . . . I can see that she is adorable."

DOROTHEA LOUISE MANN
Critic, in The Bookman
"The rapier of Ellen Glasgow's satire has pricked, with neatness and dispatch, the entire bubble of men's and women's relationship. . . . I would not be surprised if she were the wittiest of our novelists."

DOROTHY FOSTER GILMAN
in the Boston Transcript
". . . a brilliancy of dialogue and a competency of analysis which will put Edith Wharton to shame."

'well written'

HENRY SEIDEL CANBY
in the Saturday Review of Literature
"Miss Glasgow has taken that ancient situation, the old man's darling, and lifted it out of Virginia, out of satire, out of pathos into a breathing portrait that is as modern as it is human . . . When a mind as civilized as Miss Glasgow's looks at our generation there are new things to be said, new thrills, new beauties."

GEORGE CURRIE
in the Brooklyn Eagle
". . . only an amoeba or a mollusk or some other unfeeling thing could fail to rejoice in Judge Honeywell . . . a more real person never existed in a book . . . so well constructed that it . . . is somewhere near the head of the class of American novels."

MARY ROSS
in The Nation
". . . smooth and sparkling pages . . . both dialogue and analysis are full of sentences that seem too good to be true."

greatness'

FRANCES NEWMAN
Critic and Novelist
". . . exactly the kind of book that I can enjoy and admire equally . . . the kind of book I wish the Pulitzer Prize Committee could realize as the most civilized possible picture of the highest standards of American manhood and manners."

JOHN FARRAR
Critic
"Ellen Glasgow is rapidly stealing May Sinclair's crown . . . a great book . . . every page has its quotable gem . . . I repeat it, a great book!"

ISABEL PATERSON
Critic and Novelist
"A book we'd be glad indeed to have written . . . It has something of Jane Austen's quality."

Even Better Than "Wild Geese" Say the Critics

BOSTON TRANSCRIPT
"Better than 'Wild Geese.' The plot is stronger and better developed."

NEW YORK HERALD TRIBUNE
"It has vitality, invention, living beings. Further, it is absorbing reading."

NEW YORK EVENING POST
"Such skill sets one guessing how far as a novelist Miss Ostenso has yet to travel."

BOSTON HERALD
"If it had come along in place of 'Wild Geese' in that much advertised contest of 1925, might very conceivably have carried off first honors."

PHILADELPHIA RECORD
"Should win the plaudits of all fiction readers."

BALTIMORE EVENING SUN
"Not only equals but surpasses 'Wild Geese.'"

CHARLOTTE NEWS
"Simply great . . . written with vigor and power."

CHATTANOOGA NEWS
"One cannot help comparing Miss Ostenso to Willa Cather."

SAVANNAH PRESS
"Moves with dramatic swiftness and fine balance."

HARTFORD COURANT
"A notably fine novel."

CLEVELAND TOPICS
"Readers of 'Wild Geese' will be more than satisfied."

SAN FRANCISCO NEWS
"A real novel."

SACRAMENTO BEE
"One of the distinctive novels of the season."

DETROIT NEWS
"A better book than 'Wild Geese.' She is doing for the plains of Minnesota what Hardy has done so magnificently for the English heath."

writes Zona Gale, in the New York Herald Tribune, discussing Hattie Murker, heroine of "The Dark Dawn," and the talk of the book world this season. Hattie Murker "had never been called 'pretty' or 'lovely.' She was colloquially 'handsome' and to strangers 'striking.' She had black, glossy hair, that waved in a trained fashion over her ears. Her shoulders were square, almost to angularity, her breast and hips aggressively voluptuous. She had the dark, burning eyes of the Gipsy and the white skin of a Madonna."

But physical charms were a minor asset in the career of this amazing woman. Her determination to dominate, her power, her ruthlessness, make her stand out as few characters have in recent novels. No book this Fall has caused more discussion than the story of Hattie Murker and the Minnesota prairie lad, Lucian Dorritt.

The DARK DAWN

By Martha Ostenso

Author of "Wild Geese"

CRITICS are almost unanimous in agreeing that in "The Dark Dawn" Martha Ostenso has written a greater story than her "Wild Geese," which won the Dodd Mead Prize Novel competition last year, was the best-seller for many months, and is now in its second hundred thousand. "The Dark Dawn" is one of the significant and important books of 1926.

world arenas until the Americas have become merely a great island lying between the two shores of the world continent," he adds:

They are to the world what Great Britain is to Europe, or Japan to East Asia; and henceforth they can no more isolate themselves from world politics than those two nations can from areas they adjoin. The real problem of the Americas, therefore, is to face the future, not the past, and plan for a thousand years ahead.

The book is intended both for general reading and for use in college classes and is eminently fitted for both purposes, since its style is notably interesting, its narrative not too much detailed and its treatment more widely illuminating than this subject sometimes receives.

BURBANK'S RELIGION

LUTHER BURBANK, "OUR BELOVED INFIDEL": His Religion of Humanity. By Frederick W. Clampett. Introductory note and Epilogue by David Starr Jordan. Frontispiece. 144 pp. New York: The Macmillan Company. $1.50.

LAST Winter, a few months before his death, Luther Burbank was asked by a reporter from a San Francisco paper for a statement concerning his religion. His brief reply, in which he characterized himself as an "infidel," had wide publicity and aroused a seething controversy, in the course of which much abuse was poured upon him. Many churches in San Francisco offered their pulpits from which to deliver a reply and to explain more clearly his religious conceptions. He was finally persuaded to make an address in the First Congregational Church, where he delivered "A Challenge to Thought." It brought him telegrams, cables, letters—9,000 of them—from all over the world. It is this episode, as marking the climax of Burbank's spiritual life, with which this small volume chiefly deals. Its author, a long-intimate friend, describes the event and its attendant circumstances, quotes from many of the letters, interestingly analyzes and classifies them and writes with much detail and evident knowledge of the basis and significance of Burbank's religion, which he calls "the religion of humanity." Luther Burbank seems to have believed that this religion would come to be widely accepted and would be "a living challenge to do and to serve," with love as its foundation, "the supreme force that puts man in tune with the infinite," while it would stress "the infinite reality of good." He considered the question of personal immortality, says Mr. Clampett, of secondary importance. He spoke of this life as "the great adventure" and "the immortal present."

The author pays the warmest tribute over and over again to the personality, the spiritual sweetness and integrity, the utter mental honesty of the naturalist. Himself a Protestant Episcopal clergyman for many years, he says of Luther Burbank: "His philosophy of life, his personal opinions and beliefs on the vital relationship of science to religion, in which I was privileged to share his deepest convictions, have done more to consolidate my faith than any other one of the human contacts of my entire ministry."

There is an interesting chapter which describes Burbank's youthful environment and discusses the early influences which shaped his intellectual tendencies and helped to determine his career. Another is filled with terse sentences wherein Burbank sought to put into concise form his conclusions and thoughts on spiritual matters. In the religious flux of the present the little book is a timely one, and will offer to many disturbed souls much food for thinking and much help.

"The luckiest boy who has lived since that jolly expedition set out for Treasure Island."—N. Y. Times

13-year-old

who's written two supremely successful books for boys and girls

DAVID WENT TO GREENLAND with eyes and ears wide open. No voluminous literature of Northern exploration had prepared him for the things he was to see and do. No mature cynicism threatened to take the edge off a glorious adventure. He went North with the spirit of the true pioneer—with every mile unfolding new wonders, every day new thrills. He went as a full-fledged member of a group of distinguished explorers, navigators and naturalists. For, had he not won his spurs last year in the Galapagos Islands? He went, not as a pampered, protected child, but with a real job to do, a big part to play on an expedition that had a very definite purpose and much to do in a short time.

AT THE AGE OF THIRTEEN, David has accompanied two scientific expeditions and has written two best selling books. He has created a brand new kind of juvenile literature. He writes books for youngsters, based upon his own exciting adventures, and tells in his delightfully naive, direct and gusty way all the things he did and saw and heard. He writes with the engaging ingenuousness of boyhood, galloping through eventful days with incident crowded upon incident. He forgets nothing and the telling loses none of his contagious enthusiasm. He makes dreams come true, for while he has actually done what every other lad must envy, he lets them all in on it, like a "true explorer and man of honor."

DAVID GOES TO GREENLAND

A POLAR FAMILY

David's new book "David Goes to Greenland" is the story of his experiences with the American Museum Greenland Expedition which sailed North in 1926 in search of specimens of animal life. It is a stirring tale of adventure beyond the Arctic Circle—deeds to delight every boy and girl and grown-up! Captain Bob Bartlett, Peary's old skipper, commanded the Morrissey. Bob Peary, the Admiral's son, was along, and Arthur Young, the bow and arrow expert, and Carl Dunrud, the cowboy from Sweet Grass, Montana, and Dan Streeter,* big game hunter—a gorgeous crew for any boy to work and play with. What with running aground, capturing walrus and Polar bear with western rope and bow and arrow, collecting narwhal, and all the rest of it, in strange places and with stranger people, David has a story to tell that is one long adventure. 47 pages of photographs illustrate the book, in addition to many drawings by Kakutia, the Eskimo artist. $1.75.

THE TWO BOOKS "DAVID GOES TO GREENLAND" AND "DAVID GOES VOYAGING" ARE PACKED TOGETHER IN AN ATTRACTIVE BOX—AN IDEAL GIFT. $3.50.

IF we are to have a new Louis Bromfield novel next year thanks will be due, it appears, to a refractory motor. We quote from a letter from Mr. Bromfield to his publisher, Frederick A. Stokes Company:

We motored up from St. Jean, and at Bordeaux the motor broke down and we sat there for ten days while the Paris supply station sent down one wrong part after another. The French are all right until you want to get something done, and then I'd rather be in Germany. And they always want to please you so badly that they'll tell all sorts of lies in order to hit upon what you want to hear. However, we spent the ten days in a comfortable hotel, with the best of food and wine. Started a new novel and did a lot of painting, and everybody had a good time, but it only gave me two days in Paris before starting for Italy.

Such are the hardships of the literary life as it is in Europe. Mr. Bromfield should have remained in the U. S. A., where spare motor parts may be bought in any five and ten cent store.

After bringing his two-million-dollar collection of old books over from Germany to the Eucharistic Congress in Chicago and later exhibiting it at the National Arts Club in New York, Dr. Otto H. F. Vollbehr was so alarmed at the ravages of the American climate on his rare old bindings that he called in an American "book doctor," Miss Janet C. Lewis of New York, to refurbish them. It was a difficult task, for the bindings were of many different sorts and each sort required a different treatment, but Miss Lewis accomplished it to the complete satisfaction of Dr. Vollbehr, who declares that he feels convinced that many of his rare bindings received a new lease of life because of her painstaking efforts. How time flies! Ten years ago no German would have dearied to suggest that our climate was not the best in the world.

Miss Sophie Irene Loeb, author of "Palestine Awake: The Rebirth of a Nation," just published by the Century Company, has directed that all royalties accruing from the book be given to the United Palestine Appeal.

At the Literary Vespers, conducted by Edgar White Burrill at Aeolian Hall this afternoon at 5:45, the subject will be "The Adventure of Living." Mr. Burrill will discuss "The World of William Closson," by H. G. Wells. Eugene Savage's mural, "Fame and Fortune," will be loaned from Grand Central Art Galleries, and there will be music by Mme. Zeta Van Gyndy Wood and Marta Elizabeth Klein. Admission is free.

The Duke University Press announces for publication this month "The Archive Anthology," a volume of verse in which twenty-nine poets, including some of the leading lyrists in the country, are represented. The collection is edited by R. P. Harrips and the poems included are taken chiefly from Volume 38 of The Archive, a literary review published and edited by undergraduates in Duke University, but open to contributors from all sections of the country. The volume contains an introductory essay by Jay B. Hubbell, Professor of English in Southern Methodist University and one of the editors of The Southwest Review.

Margaret Deland wrote her new novel, "The Kays" (Harper & Bros.), seven times. It started out to be a short story, but grew and grew with each rewriting until it became a full-length novel. That is what makes the life of an author so exciting. One never knows when a fresh sheet of paper is fed into the typewriter whether it is going to be a two-line joke for Life or the opening scene of a play that will be greater than "Hamlet" or "Abie's Irish Rose."

Ford Madox Ford, whose latest novel, "A Man Can Stand Up," was published this Fall by Albert & Charles Boni, has decided definitely to remain int his country for at least a year. He has agreed to write two novels for the Bonis. The first of the novels, a story of New England, will be published late in the Spring.

A curious book announced by the Viking Press for publication early in the Spring is "A Record of Strange Nations," translated from an old manuscript (probably of the fourteenth century) found in China. It is a story of travel and exploration and has quaint old wood-block illustrations.

The Frederick A. Stokes Company is celebrating its forty-fifth anniversary by issuing a little volume called "The House of Stokes." It contains a history of the publishing house from the time it was established in 1881 by Frederick A. Stokes to the present day.

A new publishing house in London is The Diamond Press, Ltd., with offices at 10 Adam Street, Adelphi, W. C. 2. The firm will shortly issue a Chinese secret society novel, "The Jade Rabbit," by Adele Blood and Tam Marriott, with five illustrations in color by Charles Fouqueray.

Zane Grey will sail from San Francisco on Dec. 29 with his eldest son, Romer, to join his ship, The Fisherman, for a seven months' cruise in Australian and New Zealand waters and among the South Sea Islands winding up at Papeete. He is going fishing, and in order that the goggle-eyed world may be kept informed as to his success he has a fully equipped radio installation aboard, together with photographic apparatus and a tank for bringing home such specimens as must be seen to be believed. He is taking no chances on being called an Ananias. This will be Mr. Grey's second expedition to these waters. The story of the first was told in "Tales of the Angler's Eldorado: New Zealand," recently published by Harper & Brothers.

The subject of Dr. J. G. Carter Troop's free lecture at the Hotel Majestic this afternoon at 3:30 will be "Crewe Train," by Rose Macaulay, published by Boni & Liveright. The lecture will be repeated at Pilgrim Hall tomorrow evening.

The publicity department of G. P. Putnam's Sons informs us that young Deric Nusbaum of Mesa Verde has been visiting that other boy explorer and author, David Binney Putnam, and that the two boys began their acquaintance with a fight in the Putnam back yard. Very interesting so far as it goes, but—who won the fight?

A note in THE NEW YORK TIMES BOOK REVIEW of two weeks ago stated that the edition of Lafcadio Hearn's "Writings and Letters," published by Greenberg, Publisher, Inc., was limited to 2,000 copies. The number should have been 200. To a collector of rare editions that extra cipher might make all the difference in the world.

A few weeks ago "Little Benny's Book," by Lee Pape, was classified in our column of "Latest Books" as a juvenile. The publishers, Macy-Masius, call our attention to the fact that it is a book of humor aimed chiefly at the adult mind. It is about a boy, but the things that boys do are often funnier to their elders than to the boys themselves.

The fifteenth annual appeal for the One Hundred Neediest Cases appears today in Section 8. Read it.

Theodore Dreiser

He stands supreme in American literature. European opinion acknowledges him a figure of world importance. His "AN AMERICAN TRAGEDY" has been hailed abroad, as well as in America, as one of the world's great books. Give books by this American master.

An American Tragedy

JUST PUBLISHED 6TH LARGE EDITION

THE latest European tribute comes from Denmark: "With AN AMERICAN TRAGEDY, Theodore Dreiser has written his name in the very small book with the very few pages that holds the names of the greatest in the literature of the world. by Alastair

FIFTY DRAWINGS
With a Note of Introduction by Carl Van Vechten

The drawings in this book, the first collection of Alastair's drawings since 1914, are reminiscent of Beardsley, but distinctly individual—the products of "a tortured, perverse, morbid temperament, informed with a bitter sensitiveness and a divine pity." The book, printed in collotype by the Curwen Press, of London, on hand-made paper, is called by Henry McBride in the New York Sun "a sumptuous production, and a credit to the house of Knopf."
Edition limited to 1000 copies. No English edition
8vo, boards and cloth back $20.00

known and surmised about those brave navigators and Pacific pioneers and the chief features of their racial culture, Mr. Kuykendall takes up the story, turning his attention especially to the Hawaiian Islands and the first European knowledge of them, gained by Captain Cook's voyage. Then he follows the development of affairs, the rise and reign of Kamehameha, the acts of his successors, the coming of the fur and sandalwood traders, the introduction of Christianity, the achievement of independence, and so on down to the present time. Throughout he devotes a good deal of attention to the development of commerce, agriculture and industry and the growth of civilization.

The contacts with the United States resulting in annexation are fairly dealt with and several chapters are devoted to present-day industrial development and problems. Among these problems the greatest is that of racial complexity and the necessity of harmonizing and making Americans out of these many and diverse races and nationalities. Mr. Kuykendall tells briefly what is being done by schools and other agencies in the work of Americanization and he devotes some space to describing the efforts of men of far vision in Hawaii and elsewhere to promote international good-will in the Pacific by scientific, educational and commercial cooperation. Of all the varied scenes of our national domain, there is none with a more fascinating background or more alluring setting and none with tougher problems to solve than our Territory of Hawaii, and Mr. Kuykendall has done a real public service in thus presenting its story so faithfully and in so readable a style.

OUR FOREIGN POLICIES

FOREIGN POLICIES OF THE UNITED STATES. Their Bases and Development. By James Quayle Dealey. 402 pp. New York: Ginn & Co. $3.80.

ONE gets in this book a richer and more varied fare than its title promises. Its author, who is Professor of Social and Political Science in Brown University, has been, he says in his preface, deeply interested in world politics for many years, and this volume is the result of constant study, lecturing and teaching in his chosen field. The consequence is that it is widely based on a rich background. At every step in the development of its subject the door is thrown open on the world panorama of the moment and the American action is related to the influences and purposes of the rest of the picture, not only as leading up to the development but as resulting from it.

The first half of the book studies the conditions that influence a nation's development and determine the course of its growth and of its relations with other countries and applies these principles to the founding and evolution of American foreign policy. The second half outlines the chief factors in our foreign policy, and then in a chapter each takes up the several policies, shows the conditions and needs out of which our foreign policy grew, the purposes it has served, the changes it has undergone and the present status of its relation to world affairs. Thus it brought home to the reader by the mere facts of the case that the United States and its foreign policy, instead of being the isolated phenomenon it is too often considered, has been from the first in intimate and ever-increasing relationship with the rest of the world and has shared with it the influences and impulses conditioning action.

Although Mr. Dealey writes in as impartial a spirit as it is usually given to a healthy human to achieve, he has his own convictions about many of these matters and sometimes expresses them, but entirely without heat or arrogance. A constant flow of temperate and informed discussion illuminates all the narrative. An interesting and very satisfactory feature is that the author sufficiently emphasizes the unstable quality of human institutions and policies, bringing out constantly the changing national and world conditions that necessarily influence world relationships, and so shows the need of open minds and plastic thinking. Thus, speaking of the tremendous developments of the last hundred years that "have reduced

The Best Encyclopaedia in the English Language

BECAUSE— By the new modern Loose-Leaf binding it is always years later than any other Encyclopaedia
It is always new—The Encyclopaedia For A Life Time

Look it up in NELSON'S

The Only Encyclopaedia That Changes With the Changing World

Read this Boy's letter

"I am a boy twelve years old, in the 7th Grade. We had a lot of home work and I used to ask Dad about Geography, History and other subjects. Dad said, the subjects change so often, that he couldn't remember, so he helped me to look up the different subjects in our Nelson's Loose-Leaf Encyclopaedia. Now, I have the habit of looking things up for myself.

"Teacher noticed my answers were always correct and asked me who helped me. I told her Nelson's Encyclopaedia and she gave me an extra credit for looking up my own subjects.

"I also get a lot of information from Nelson's about Sports, Radio, Automobiles, and other things not in my home lessons."

FRED LEISSING, Milwaukee, Wisconsin.

The Great American Encyclopaedia

Made in America—by Americans—for Americans
And it covers the whole World

Dedicated by permission to Calvin Coolidge, President of the United States

Nelson's Loose-Leaf Encyclopaedia Is the Standard Encyclopaedia of the World

BECAUSE—

Nelson's patented Loose-Leaf Binding Device keeps it always new—it cannot grow old. Each six months subscribers receive 250 or more new, rewritten pages to insert in the Volumes in place of the pages that because of the march of the world's progress and activities have become out of date. With this new Loose-Leaf Method you can always be sure of your facts. Never was there so much need for a complete and up to date fund of world knowledge as today.

Nelson's Reader's Guide—A College Education

It is not necessary to go to a university to get an education. A splendid education can be had on every subject taught in colleges and is within your grasp if you know how to obtain it. The Nelson Reader's Guide consists of 33 full study courses based on the Encyclopaedia. It provides a course of reading for everyone, whatever his interests, from Aeronautics to Zoology. It is written in a human and absorbing style compelling the reader's interest and making him eager to supplement his reading in the Encyclopaedia.

Index Volume

The wonderful new Index of 900 pages—more than 200,000 references—immensely increases the value of the Encyclopaedia. Were each subject contained in NELSON'S treated under a separate heading the work would expand to fifty or seventy-five volumes. The index, by listing all these headings within a single volume, makes available a mass of information otherwise scattered through the twelve volumes. It is the Key which unlocks thousands of hidden treasures in Nelson's Loose-Leaf Encyclopaedia.

Nelson's Free Research Bureau

For scientific reports and special information and correspondence. Every purchaser of Nelson's is entitled to free membership in this Bureau. If at any time you are in doubt on any subject, old or new, write to this Bureau with the positive assurance that you will promptly receive the latest obtainable and most dependable information.

Why Pay for Old, Obsolete Bound Volumes?

By the time an encyclopaedia composed of permanently bound volumes is delivered to you, it is anywhere from three to five years out of date! And trying to bring it up to date by issuing supplementary volumes now and then is simply a makeshift, and a confusing one. The reader, struggling through several volumes and supplements, finds an uncorrelated mass of material and conflicting statements from which he must disentangle, as best he may, the information he requires. This old cumbersome method has given so much dissatisfaction that frequently two volumes are bound in one, but this only adds to the complexity. Why pay for a large percentage of out of date misinformation? The New Way—Nelson's Loose-Leaf Encyclopaedia—with no dead wood, brought up to date every six months—saves you money, time, patience. It is the only really new and up to date Encyclopaedia obtainable at any price.

Recommendations of the Press

NEW YORK TIMES: By novel binding device NELSON'S ENCYCLOPAEDIA solves problems of perpetual freshness. A book that never grows old, that will give answer years after its publication to the most modern queries.

NEW YORK WORLD: The Encyclopaedia of the future. The quest for an encyclopaedia which shall be always up-to-date has come to a successful issue.

REVIEW OF REVIEWS: NELSON'S is used as an authority in our editorial rooms.

THE INDEPENDENT: NELSON'S PERPETUAL LOOSE-LEAF ENCYCLOPAEDIA, a copy of which we have in our office, is a work that we simply cannot get along without, for the simple reason that the loose-leaf system provides for the latest information available.

THE LONDON TIMES says: "Nelson's large editorial staff is at the disposal of their customers, and they are, as the most extensive Encyclopaedia publishers in the world, able to put a vast body of information at the service of those who desire it."

PHILADELPHIA NORTH AMERICAN: NELSON'S ENCYCLOPAEDIA brings the record of popular information down to the earlier and later months of each year. . . . NELSON'S is the only encyclopaedia depended upon in this office.

THE MINNEAPOLIS JOURNAL: The publishers of NELSON'S have solved the problem of successful reference-book making. The loose-leaf device meets all the objections heretofore made to the perishable character of an encyclopaedia.

THE EVEREST EPIC

THE EPIC OF MOUNT EVEREST. By Sir Francis Younghusband. Illustrated. 319 pp. New York: Longmans, Green & Co. $3.

NO one is better fitted to write the story of the struggle between Everest and man than Sir Francis Younghusband, who, by reason of long residence and much exploration in India and intimate acquaintance with the Himalayan region, knows the subject thoroughly on that side, while his keen interest in mountain climbing in general and the ascent of Everest in particular complete his equipment. As Chairman of the Mount Everest Committee he has been in close touch with the developments of the project. In preparing this book he has used freely the descriptions of their ascents written by members of the three expeditions, 1921, 1922 and 1924, condensing much and making the whole into a continuous narrative of three parts. But those familiar with his other books on India will recognize, throughout his spirit, his sensitiveness to mountain landscape and his always charming literary touch. And now and then, especially at the beginning and the end of the work, he indulges in discussion of the philosophy of the determination to conquer Everest and shows its cause. "The struggle with Everest," he says, "is all part and parcel of the perpetual struggle of spirit over matter. Man, the spiritual, means to make himself supreme over even the mightiest of what is material. The mountain may be high. But he will show that his spirit is higher. And he will not be content until he has it in subjection under his feet."

In addition to the accounts of the preparations for and the climbing experiences and achievements of the three expeditions, there is interspersed much graphic description of localities and scenes before the high altitudes were reached, wherein is evident Sir Francis's own observation of Himalayan landscape and his reaction to its appeal. The entire story, as Sir Francis tells it, is replete with human interest in its account of the contacts with natives, of the services of the native porters, of the personalities and achievements of the members of the expeditions. And the whole spirit of the book is that of pride and glory in the strength and skill and indomitable soul of man that will not rest until he has conquered the mighty crest of Everest. The author sees his subject and writes his narrative in the spirit of the title—as an epic of splendid struggle and glorious achievement which has reached the beginning of the end for "the doomed mountain." It is a heroic story, and in thus combining the accounts of the three expeditions in one narrative Sir Francis Younghusband has made a contribution to literature as well as to the history of mountain climbing and supreme human achievement.

HAWAIIAN HISTORY

A HISTORY OF HAWAII. Prepared Under the Direction of the Historical Commission of the Territory of Hawaii by Ralph S. Kuykendall. Introductory Chapters by Herbert E. Gregory. Illustrations and Maps. 375 pp. New York: The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

INTENDED primarily for use as a textbook in the higher grades of Hawaiian schools, Mr. Kuykendall's "History of Hawaii" is so interestingly written and gives so comprehensive a survey of our island territory that any one for whom the subject has attraction or consequence will find it well worth while. The islands are becoming a favorite Winter resort for tourists from all parts of the United States, and such of these travelers as like to journey understandingly ought to make the volume one of the essentials of their baggage. The first three chapters, by the director of the Bishop Museum, in Honolulu, start the story at its uttermost beginning, far back in the mists of the Pacific prehistoric time when the daring Polynesians were venturing in their tiny outrigger canoes from island to island across the vast expanse of the stormy ocean.

After this account of what is

CHERRY SQUARE

by GRACE S. RICHMOND

The author of those famous stories, RED PEPPER BURNS, RED AND BLACK, etc., has caught all of our lives up in this novel. It is the last book published before Christmas—It is a Christmas present everyone will adore. At all bookstores, $2.00

Doubleday, Page & Co.

"My dear, what a thoughtful gift! Nothing could possibly please me more!"

That is the sort of exclamation you wish to hear, when someone who is dear to you receives your remembrance. If that person be a reader, could there be a more appropriate gift than to enable him to make sure that he will always keep abreast of the best books of the day?

The Christmas Gift Certificate illustrated here is printed handsomely in three colors. An envelope to match is furnished with it. You can mail it, or deliver it yourself; or if desired we will mail it for you.

GIVE HIM— GIVE HER—
A Subscription to the Book-of-the-Month Club

The outstanding book each month will thereafter come—just like a magazine.

PUT yourself in the place of some friend who likes to read good books. How gratifying it would be to him always to keep up with the best books! At present, if he is like the rest of us, he is either too busy, or it is too inconvenient for him to go out and get them. In the end, all too frequently, he misses them altogether. He admits that he never "gets around to them."

What a thoughtful gift to present such a person with a subscription to the Book-of-the-Month Club! Every month,—for six months or a year as you choose—the outstanding new book published that month will be handed to him by the postman, just like a magazine.

Makes His Own Choice

But will he like the books he will receive? How can you be positive his especial taste in books will be satisfied? Very simply. The outstanding book each month is selected, from all the books of the publishers, by a group of well known critics, whose judgment as to books and whose catholicity of taste, have long been known to the public. They are: Henry Seidel Canby, Chairman, Heywood Broun, Dorothy Canfield, Christopher Morley, William Allen White. Now, it is reasonably certain that a book chosen by such a committee is likely to be one that an intelligent reader will not care to miss.

But the choice of these judges is not set up as an infallible opinion which is not to be questioned. Tastes differ. Your friend may disagree with the choice in any one month. He may receive a book which he would never have purchased himself. If so, he may exchange the book he receives for anyone of a number of other new books, which are simultaneously reported upon by the Selecting Committee—for the very purpose of enabling him to make a discriminating choice, if he cares to.

The final result is that the recipient of your gift does obtain, and he does read, only the type of new books he cares to read.

If you wish to make a present of a subscription to the Book-of-the-Month Club, it can be done very simply. There is no red tape. It will be no more trouble to you than mailing a Christmas card.

How To Subscribe

We will send you a beautifully illuminated Christmas Gift Certificate. (An inadequate illustration of it is shown above). You fill in the name of the person you wish to favor, and deliver it yourself at Christmas, or mail it if you desire. Thus you can be sure it will be received in time. At the same time, you notify us that you have made the gift, and to whom. The service to your recipient will start with the January "book-of-the-month." (We will mail the Certificates for you if you so desire.)

The cost of the books to you is only the price set upon them by the publishers themselves. No charge is made for the service itself. Write for full particulars about how this service operates, and also for Christmas Gift Certificates, specifying how many you wish.

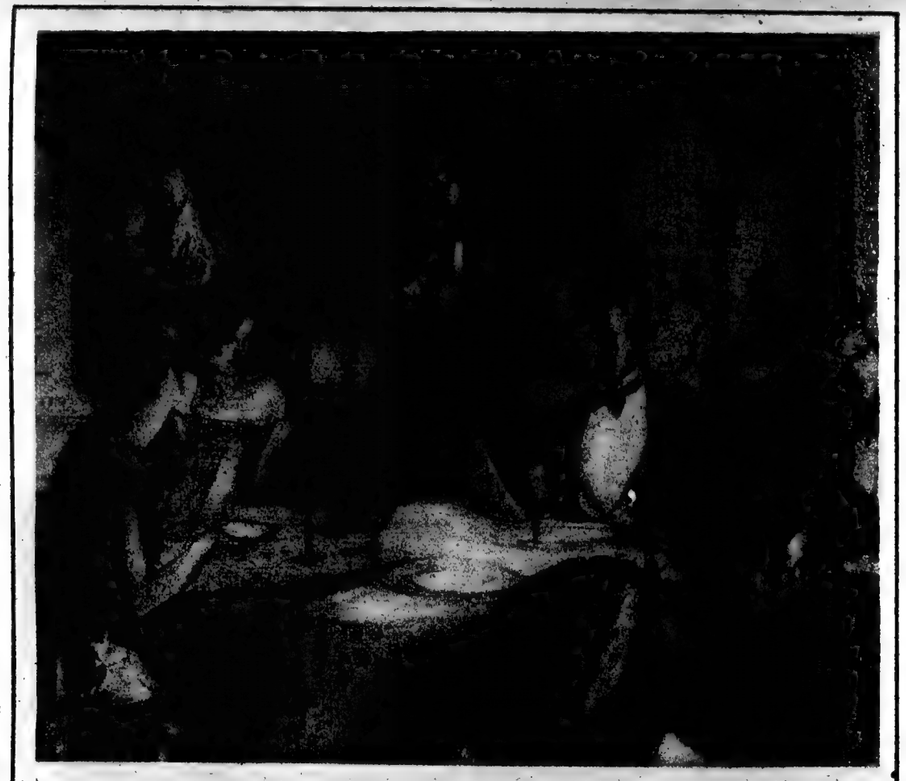
American cooking—soft and creamy—robs the gums of the exercise they need



Today, our cooks and chefs prepare a profusion of tasty dishes to delight our palates. But wherever we go, wherever we dine, our food is soft, creamy, over-refined—lacking in the roughage and fibre that was meant to provide the exercise and stimulation which keep our gums in health.

WHEN next you sit down to a meal, notice carefully the dishes planned to whet your appetite and to appease your hunger. Luscious viands, succulent dainties, creamy desserts—all so very tempting to the palate.

And, as your dentist would add, all so very harmful to the gums. For our diet of soft, refined foods, the dentists have discovered, is the cause of most of the gum troubles so rampant today.

Why soft food is an enemy to the health of our gums

To prepare these dainty eatables that modern taste demands, our wives, our cooks and caterers have removed the coarse and fibrous elements. And that's what starts trouble for our gums!

For, through the act of mastication, these husks, these peelings, all this roughage that we so complacently discard, were meant to stimulate and stir our gums to health—to keep a plentiful supply of rich, red blood in constant circulation within their walls.

But modern gums lead a stagnant life. From the food we eat they get no work, no exercise. Hence they soften, they weaken and slowly lose their tone. "Pink tooth brush" is a call for help from over-coddled and understimulated gums.

Hasty eating, too, contributes to the trouble, for it cheats our teeth and gums of what little work is left for them by this modern diet of ours.

And there you have, in simple statement, the cause of nearly all these ailments of the gums that plague so many thousands today.

How to bring your gums back to normal health

We could not, even if we would, revert to a diet of raw roots and unpeeled fruits. Civilization has settled that almost beyond our control.

So the dentists turn to massage—massage with the brush and massage with the fingers—as the most practical means to make up the lack. Both methods are good.

And both are improved when they are performed with Ipana Tooth Paste. For Ipana, with its content of ziratol, has a most beneficent effect upon soft and weakened gum tissue. A preparation with true hemostatic and antiseptic powers, ziratol is widely used by dentists. Its presence in Ipana hastens and improves the good effects of any gum massage.

So brush your gums! Brush them lightly with Ipana as you brush your teeth! Don't begrudge the extra moment or two. If at first your gums seem tender to the brush, give them a finger massage with Ipana after the regular cleaning of the teeth. Many dentists prescribe this to their patients as a regular regime for keeping the gums in health as well as for restoring them to their normal tonicity. For they know well that the best time to fight gum troubles is before they start.

Give Ipana at least a month's trial

Of course the ten-day tube will be gladly sent if you mail the coupon. Your very first brushing will convince you that Ipana will keep your teeth as clean and brilliant as you could wish. And in all likelihood you will find Ipana's flavor a delicious surprise.

But ten days can only start the good work on your gums. So the better plan is to get a full-size tube at once from your nearest drug store, and give your gums a full month of Ipana. Then you can decide if you wish to make Ipana your tooth paste for life.

Doctors and dentists today trace many serious bodily ailments to tooth and gum troubles. You should see your dentist regularly and do a light massage of the gums with Ipana, as this page tells you. Then you will see how quickly your gums respond to good care.

ENTER THE GENERAL OF SCIENCE

An Amazing Picture of Modern Industry's Great Research Laboratories, Commanded by Scientists Of Note, With Regiments of Trained Men at Work on Problems Near and Far-Reaching

"The Professional Research Scientist of Today Is a Cool, Calculating Person."

By VALENTINE KARLYN

A FEW weeks ago Dr. W. D. Coolidge of the General Electric Company's research laboratories astounded the Franklin Institute with experiments that may mark the introduction of a new era in physical chemistry, industry and medicine. Under the unprecedented pressure of 350,000 volts, electrons were driven into the atmosphere through the delicately thin nickel window of a vacuum tube of his own invention. Exposed to these electrons, acetylene was reduced to a yellowish brown powder; castor oil was solidified; calcite, a pure form of marble, glowed for hours with a purplish light of its own; bacteria were killed instantly.

When the news of these experiments was published millions must have asked themselves: Who is this man Coolidge? Why drive electrons under tremendous pressure through the spaces between the atoms of a fine nickel membrane? What is the practical good?

Coolidge belongs to the latter-day school of professional research scientists—men hired by corporations to improve industrial methods and products by tearing matter into bits and then rearranging the bits in new ways, and to give us new fuels, new lamps, new means of communication. Corporations have organized research. They have made it self-perpetuating, continuous, orderly and systematic. Instead of waiting for the casual genius to appear and startle them with a new engine or a new explosive they rely on research to proceed step by step from something that is good to something that is better.

It is probable that corporation research scientists of the Coolidge type may completely supplant the picturesque, temperamental, romantic, heroic inventor who is responsible for what economists call the "industrial revolution," which followed the invention of the condensing steam engine by Watt and gave us the modern factory. Edison may be the last and the most dazzling of heroic inventors, unmatched and perhaps unmatchable in versatility and brilliancy of achievement.

Like the literary and musical genius, the imaginative inventor and scientist is regarded by those who pride themselves on their practical common sense as a little mad north northwest. Every madman must have his keeper. The heroic inventors of the past found their keepers in strong, domineering business men whose fortunes and mercantile ability made the fruition of spasmodic research possible. Without Boulton the great Watt would have abandoned the condensing steam engine time and time again; without Hubbard, his father-in-law, Bell would never have perfected the telephone. The mechanic or chemist who engages in research needs direction and control.

The exigencies of modern manufacturing have given research and invention a new economic importance. Discovering new compounds, improving processes whereby soaps, leather, drugs and the thousand and one necessities of life are manufactured, inventing new engines and machines—all this has become as much a function of modern business as selling goods in the markets of the world. The inventor or the chemist is no longer compelled to dream, work and starve in a garret. He is hired now to make discoveries almost to order. He may be less picturesque and eccentric than of old; he may be curbed; but he eats three meals a day and drives his automobile like the rest of us. His life is as uneventful as that of any clerk. The Samuel Smiles of the future who writes his biography will find it hard to make of him a hero, battling against the blind prejudice of an ignorant industrial world.

If we miss the fine frenzy with which men like Morse and Bell conducted their investigations in the past it is because the professional research scientist of today is a cool, calculating person. His is an academically trained mind. He knows exactly what he wants to do and how it is to be done. There is nothing of the showman in him. Goodyear used to clothe himself in India rubber from head to foot. Murdock, one of the pioneers of gas-lighting, wore wooden hats made with his own hands. Many of the pioneers of invention were embryonic Barnums, who basked in publicity like latter-day motion-picture idols. The hired research scientist indignantly spurns such flattering designations as "wonder-worker," "wizard," or "magician."

Even though he patents his discoveries on behalf of his corporation employer, he sometimes objects to being called an inventor; the term is too often associated with an unkempt, half-shabby dreamer who raves of perpetual motion. Yet the chemists and engineers in corporation laboratories are not blind to the drama that lies in converting some repulsive compound into a satisfactory insulator, in forcing vacuum tubes to perform new miracles in radio, in discovering some light-sensitive cell that will make it possible to broadcast motion pictures over half the planet. They simply object to being classed as human freaks.

Most of these hired research scientists are university trained physicists, engineers, chemists and metallurgists who take their work seriously, but who always maintain a strictly impersonal, objective attitude toward their achievements. The late Charles B. Scribner, who spent his life in the telephone laboratory of the Western Electric Company and who was granted hundreds of patents on telephone and speaking circuits, used to talk of his work in a detached way, as if he had been merely a conscious instrument in the hands of some mysterious, inviable, omniscient angel called Science. It was not he but Science which had somehow dispensed with the little crank which we once turned and which is still seen on the boxes of country telephones and without which "Central" cannot be signaled.

We have two types of industrial research in Europe and America. The one is concerned only with the attainment of commercial results; the other, more idealistic with the advancement of science, even though laboratory buildings, equipment and salaries are paid by corporations that scrutinize balance sheets with meticulous care and never spend a dollar without the prospect of earning five more. Paradoxical as it may seem, the (Continued on Page 22)

"Mr. Populi Making for Home Through the Forum Would Think That He Was at a National Convention."

"RE-CREATING ANCIENT ROME" IS A JOB TO BALK AT

Even Mussolini, Who Stirs the Populace, Might Think Twice Before Attempting to Revive Old Splendors

By L. H. ROBBINS

PREMIER MUSSOLINI gazes at the bust of Julius Caesar above his desk—"my inspiration," he calls it—and dreams of re-creating the grandeur that was Rome. Then away to the Coliseum he drives to let the people share his vision. He promises that as Sulla and Julius and some eighty other strong dictators toiled to produce an Augustan age, so will he.

Readers in light history tremble slightly in their slippers to hear him reassert his determination up and down the peninsula, which is shaped, they recall, like a large, strong boot. Mindful of what they know of Caesarism in its most high and palmy state, they wonder how far Il Duce means to go. They suspect that Rome, reconditioned as of the year 1 and set to running in the modern world, would resemble a catamount in a cafeteria to a considerable extent.

Rome today is a nice old pious pedestrian city, limping along on its fallen arches, living down its past by doing a vast amount of good and universally respected. Would it stand rejuvenation? Could the rest of us stand to have it rejuvenated? Hadn't it better be left as is? Earnest students of Gibbon ask these questions, and the skeptic in the street adds, "Just how grand was Ancient Rome, anyway?" Let calm research try to answer.

Greater Than President

Authorities agree that the City of the Seven Hills was quite a place. For two or three centuries after Augustus became the Father of His Country and elected himself to all the important Federal offices, Rome had a population, counting slaves, that ran anywhere from 500,000 to 4,000,000, according to the enthusiasm of the encyclopedist consulted. The city collected taxes, statuary and other plunder from the whole of the hardbored world and a good part of the barbarian, in all about 150,000,000 subjects. In point of constituency, therefore, to be perfectly frank and fair, the Roman Emperor was a greater man than the President of the United States.

And all the experts acknowledge Rome's architectural splendor. The city walls were thirteen miles around, at the lowest estimate, and some say fifty. The hilltops were heavy with masses of marble homes for gods and men. An American of today would take these edifices for union stations. And when the Grand Centrals had overcrowded the elevations they spread to the valleys below.

Old Vox Populi, that influential Roman citizen whose fame comes down to our day, had an eyeful wherever he looked. In half a mile of the Via Sacra, when he went to transact business with Jupiter on Capitol Hill, he would pass the Coliseum, the Temple of Venus and Rome, the Arch of Titus, the three Temples of Peace, Vesta and Castor, the Basilica Julia, the Arch of Severus and the Temple of Saturn—to Baedeker only a few of the world-renowned structures that clustered near the Roman Forum.

From the Palatine Hill on his left the palaces of the Caesar family, the mansions of the smart set and the Temple of Apollo frowned down at him. As he mounted to the Capitol, whose dome cost $15,000,000 to gild, he would see, off to the right, the huge Forums of Julius, Augustus and Trajan, and for miles down the Appian Way still more temples and tombs and monuments on the grand scale. It was a gorgeous place for architects, stone masons, concrete mixers and stucco workers. For sculptors it was a paradise. There were more statues, it is said, than people. Every street corner had its representation of little Romulus and Remus and old Mammy Wolf. There were so many busts of gold, ivory, bronze and marble about that Mr. Populi, making for home past the deserted moonlit Forum after a Fabernian evening with Maecenas, would think he was at a national convention.

There was one basilica where 180 Judges could hold court at once. There was a stretch of tribunals and rostrums 3,000 feet in length. The double colonnades of Trajan's Forum stood fifty feet above Vox's head, and the hundreds of thousands of tons of gray marble in them was, or were, forried over from Egypt. Hadrian's Temple of Venus and Rome rose on a terrace as big as Madison Square, and around it ran a portico of 400 columns forty feet high. His mighty mausoleum still remains to testify that Rome's material magnificence was not overadvertised. Still standing, too, are the Arches of Titus and Severus and the Columns of Trajan and Marcus Aurelius. These Mussolini will have as a starter in revamping old Rome, and he also has the shell of the Coliseum, which, with repairs, can be used very nicely for throwing anti-Fascists to the lions if he so desires.

That amphitheatre of Vespasian's accommodated 87,000 spectators on cushioned marble seats and had standing room for 22,000 more. Canopies sheltered the crowd from rain and sun, nets of gold wire kept the zoological exhibits out of the audience, and fountains sweetened the air with perfumes from Araby and elsewhere. The nearest we can come to a grand stand like that is the Yale Bowl, which admits only 70,000 and lets it rain on them, besides lacking the refinements of scent sprays and gold-mesh backstops. The grand opening of the Coliseum ran for 100 days, and it used up so many wild beasts that big game has been scarce in the world ever since. Five thousand of them and 10,000 gladiators helped to make that Roman holiday.

But to see a regular crowd Vox Populi would go to the Circus Maximus, down on the Campus Martius. On a chariot-racing day it held 385,000 onlookers comfortably, with seats for all. You could have put the combined populations of Elizabeth, N. J., and Hartford and New Haven, Conn., into such an arena. Comparisons being odius, let us barely mention that Mr. Rickard's Circus in Eighth Avenue takes care of just about 20,000. For minor attractions Rome had smaller show houses, whose capacity went only about as high as 80,000 each. Pompey's, a leader in the little-theare movement, had 3,000 bronze statues in the lobby and a portico of 1,100 pillars.

It is soberly pointed out to Signor Mussolini that the Fascist industrial program will be gravely disturbed if ancient Rome comes back. To supply the public amusements with pleasure-mad audiences fully half a million people will have to stay away from business.

There will also be the bath-house problem for him. Rome went in bathing tremendously. The Baths of Agrippa covered more ground than the Great Pyramid of Egypt and were supplied with water by means of a sixty-mile aqueduct that leaped valleys on 100-foot arches. The famous Pantheon, with its 200-foot dome, is said to have been merely the vestibule to that ablution establishment. Caracalla's thermae measured 1,100 feet on a side. Diocletian's had marble slabs for 3,200 patrons.

From Bath to Jail

These palatial institutions were the chief indoor resort of the Imperial Romans, including our friend Vox, who, being a citizen, went in free. By actual count of a traveler, there were once 9,025 of them, and around the Tiberius Administration, when things were getting very scandalous, these temples of cleanliness were not in the same street with godliness, by any means. The same statistical tourist counted 2,091 jails as well, and there seems to have been good reason for so many, from all that can be gathered.

In fact, the stories that come to us about the life in Rome at that period make our Broadway look like the middle aisle of the Old Salem Meeting House. They really cut loose in Rome, and that is one reason why Ridpath circles wonder just how serious the Premier is.

To support all this grandeur took a kind of international high financing that has now gone out of style on the earth, except in a few small places like China. When it was last tried by the white race, twelve years ago, it pleased hardly anybody. It consisted of going out of town with a large sack and a couple of red-blooded legions and veni-vidi-vici-ing the inferior nationalities.

In a year or so of vigorous exercise in the pleasant open air a good industrious Roman robber could collect or arrange for enough tribute to keep the Government in funds for quite a while. Then, with a wagon train of gold for himself, he would march home over the fine hard Roman roads, build a domus as big as an aviation field, buy a seat in the Senate for about $3,000,000 and become a Lord Bountiful to Vox Populi.

There were ex-Governors of provinces who owned entire cities and lived accordingly. Toward the end of the grand era there were 5,000 private palaces in Rome; and a palace in those day was no mere four-story brownstone front compressed by its neighbors like a subway passenger. It had elbow room. It was a complete town, with theatres, shops, a hippodrome, individual temples to the family gods, a bathing department, parks, fountains, fish ponds, prisons—in fact, all the ancient improvements. And every palace was bursting with rich loot from every known land worth looting.

Incomes ran as high as five million a year. A man's house servants might number 1,200. One Senator owned 20,000 common people outright. Lucullus's dinner check one day when he ate alone was $4,000. Heliogabalus slept on a mattress made of down plucked from under the wings of wild partridges. Apicius, finding his bank account reduced to a beggarly $800,000, drank a hemlock cocktail. Nero diced for $25,000 a throw. Martial joked Quintus for paying the price of a farm for a chariot—a solid gold one!

Fortunate Romans spent immense sums for hydraulic organs to keep their households in an uproar of sound. Caligula, posing as a fellow god of Jupiter's, had a thunder machine made and could be heard thundering all over town. He also built an elevated road from his palace on the Palatine over to the Capitoline, so that he and Jupiter might visit back and forth. And Nero's Golden House boasted a statue of its owner 120 feet high, not to mention three porticos, each a thousand feet long, and a banquet room that went around and around.

But Vox Populi didn't mind the extravagance of his betters. He dwelt in a miserable alley, it is true, and the nobility in their chariots had a nasty little way of running him

"History As a Human Story —Told by Very Human Writers —for the Average Intelligent Reader"

THE ideal history would perhaps be the story which one man tells to another about men in the past they are both interested in. What we go to history for is greater wisdom for our own lives. We use the experience of others in order to face the problems that confront us. Unfortunately, only a few of us know even a small part of all that has happened, and we have to turn to those few so often that their conscience sometimes becomes sensitive about the accuracy of the news they are giving us.

It is not unfortunate that historians are conscientious, but it is unfortunate that this conscientiousness has often resulted in their forgetting just what the average human being hopes to get from history. The legend has grown up among the historians that an interesting record of the past and an accurate one cannot be the same thing. But if the history is not interesting, it obviously has ceased to give us what we hoped to get from it.

The Greeks set us the example of great historical writing in Herodotus and Thucydides. Much as these two writers vary in purpose and in method, they are alike in the assumption that history should be a communication of the most human sort from man to man.

Even though there were many of us who knew the story of the past, unfortunately it would not be possible for all our fellows to come in contact with the well-informed historian, especially in America, the world is too large and too scattered. Any history in the future which is to make its full effect, must be expressed through some avenue which will reach the millions who are far beyond the influence of academic centers or of seminars in historical research. Nothing is more hopeful in our time than the growing desire of Americans to know more of the past, especially of their own past; and nothing is more interesting than the devices to which the historian is now turning to make the desired information accessible to his fellow citizens.

I have the greatest admiration for the accounts of our country provided for us in the Yale Chronicles of America. These volumes give us history as a human story, told by very human writers for the average intelligent reader. No point of view, economic, political, or social, is omitted, but in all the volumes the narrators have kept in mind the essential fact—that life is not exclusively economic, or political, or social, but in its totality it is a dramatic adventure. The accuracy of the statement is vouched for by the high reputation of the authors of each volume. The fascination of the stories is quite beyond what we have learned to expect from accurate history.

The convenience of this method of treating our history in a large number of quite portable volumes makes one think that the difficulty of bringing history to the general public is here overcome. To do justice to this large subject, many volumes were needed, but each book has its complete interest, and fits the pocketbook as well as the pocket.

THE RESEARCH GENERAL OF SCIENCE ENTERS

untrammeled laboratory that works in the idealistic spirit of a university, with no direct industrial end in view, makes more startling, and, in the end, more practical discoveries. The "practical" industrial laboratory, conducted for the sole purpose of obtaining immediate commercial results, enriches its corporation founders with millions; but the idealistic laboratory, which delves in pure science, has earned tens of millions.

Thus the German coal-tar industry would never have given the world ten thousand synthetic perfumes, drugs, antiseptics, explosives and dyes without research in pure, organic chemistry, and the greatest of American electrical manufacturing companies would never have reduced the cost of light to one-third of what it was fifteen years ago unless it had given its research scientists a free hand in studying the chemistry and physics of reactions that occur in a vacuum. Coolidge's success in forcing electrons out of an X-ray tube into the atmosphere and performing astonishing experiments with them is due to this idealistic policy. Ten years hence the Coolidge method of harnessing electrons will probably be applied in factories to produce compounds of which we are not yet aware, and unimaginable industries will be founded.

Whatever its type may be, the laboratory of a great corporation is conducted as punctiliously as if it were a factory or a selling office. At the head of it stands a man who is not only a scientist of national, even world-wide, reputation, but a man who possesses the qualifications of leadership.

Research is systematized and conducted day in and day out in such a laboratory. Chemists, physicists, engineers and metallurgists keep regular office hours and draw regular salaries. At the top of the staff, next to the director, stand from three to twelve doctors of philosophy, men who may have once filled unremunerative professorial positions in universities. Below these we find recent graduates from universities eager to learn what corporation research means, mechanics, instrument makers, glass-blowers, artisans representing a dozen or more handicrafts—privates in this scientific regiment.

How the Task Is Laid Out

The task to be performed is assigned, but not quite as definitely as if it were brick-laying or typewriting. There are periodic conferences in which the director and the top men discuss a problem which, if solved, means either the saving or the making of millions in the factory. The problem may be suggested by the factory managers or the corporation's officers, or it may originate in the laboratory itself.

Usually the suggestions that come from the offices of the corporation or the factory are of minor technical importance. A water-proof paste is wanted for cartons. The lubricant used under heavy pressure and at high temperature in some machines is not satisfactory. Will the laboratory please supply a heavy grease that is better? The glass used in connection with a certain metal cracks because the metal and the glass do not expand at the same rate when heated. Can the laboratory specify a metal which will have the same co-efficient of expansion as glass?

These are regarded as simple questions, although they can be definitely answered only after months of experimenting. Far more profound and far-reaching are the problems that the members of the research staff themselves propound.

They never work blindly—these hired inventors and discoverers, these modern revolutionists of industry. First, the "literature" of the subject is studied—patents, books and technical articles in French, German and English, some of them published two centuries ago. The researcher saturates himself in his subject. He begins where his predecessors left off. Perhaps he may repeat a few of the more promising experiments recorded in old patents, books and articles, to verify the conclusions reached or to ascertain if some tremendous trifle has been overlooked; for in chemistry and engineering trifles are always tremendous, spelling as they sometimes do the difference between failure and success.

But not yet is the researcher ready to marshal the laboratory's resources. He works at his problem mathematically or with formulas and graphs. He wastes no time on experiments which are hopeless because they cannot possibly satisfy one or more of a hundred scientific "laws" and well-established principles.

Here he differs from the Arkwrights, Stephensons, McCormicks and Morses of old. They had to build models in the beginning, often a score before one was conceived that was worth development. He begins with something that he knows to be attainable, although it may not be the product that will ultimately be described in a patent assigned to the corporation. But he does as little guessing, as little empirical work as he can. Dr. Irving Langmuir of the General Electric Company's research laboratory worked out the modern gas-filled incandescent lamp on paper after he had discovered the relation of heat-radiation to wire diameters and why bulbs blackened. He predicted that his unborn gas-filled lamp would consume a half watt of energy for each candle-power. It did—the very first made in the laboratory under his direction.

Not until he has definitely decided what course is most likely to lead to the desired result is the researcher ready to begin actual experiment. Then he becomes a general of science. He summons instrument-makers, artisans, mechanics and directs them to make the apparatus that he needs, precisely indicating by drawings and written descriptions the material to be used, dimensions, and the character of the workmanship expected. In conducting the actual experiments he usually has lesser lights to help him. It is reported that at one time Dr. Coolidge commanded the services of twenty-two assistants in solving the stupendously difficult problem of making brittle tungsten so ductile that it can be drawn into a filament.

When, after months and even years of patient experimenting and testing, an industrial scientist at last reports that he has succeeded in producing a new lamp, a new synthetic dye, a new alloy, a new tube for radio receivers, and makes his report, the task is far from being completed. The research laboratory is usually not concerned with designing factory machinery or devising the processes whereby a new device can be made. That is left to special development laboratories managed by directors of their own. Here the engineer reigns supreme.

Without research and development laboratories of the type described there would be no radio broadcasting; no photographic industry paying dividends greater than those of all German coal-tar works combined; no corn-products industry to utilize corn which might be used as fuel for lack of a market; no meat-packing industry to make money out of the things the old-time butcher threw away; no telephone industry to link New York with San Francisco; not one of the electrochemical products now made by utilizing great water-power.

Research either creates something new or enhances values. A standing pine tree is worth $10 a ton. Fell it and strip it and its value leaps to $15 a ton. Apply research, find out how it can be converted into paper and it is worth $55 a ton as pulp. Take the pulp and discover in the laboratory how it can be transformed into artificial silk and the price soars to $5,500 a ton. Clearly, research pays.

Research need not be conducted on an epic scale to yield rich manufacturing returns. Chemists and engineers who have their own laboratories can be hired like doctors and lawyers. One office building in New York is entirely given over to chemists and their laboratories—practitioners of industrial research retained by small manufacturers who know that as little as $2,000 a year spent now in research for purely commercial ends may net tens of thousands five years hence.

Following the example set by the Mellon Institute of the University of Pittsburgh, several of our universities have established departments of industrial research to which the small manufacturer may also resort when he finds it hard to keep pace with the gigantic strides made by the large corporations. A few thousand dollars placed at the disposal of these universities, the signing of a contract whereby a small royalty is paid to the post-graduate student who may successfully solve a set problem—nothing more is required to keep any small manufacturer in step with the research procession. Cosmetics, hair dyes, glue making, oil-cracking, papermaking, automobile engines, breadmaking, laundering, glassmaking, every conceivable product and manufacturing activity has been studied by these comparatively new university departments of industrial research. Rarely is a downright failure reported.

Cooperative Research

When the demands on research become financially too burdensome, the small manufacturer by the mere act of joining an association of competitors enjoys the profits of research. Canners, paint makers laundrymen and cement manufacturers have thus joined forces and established association research laboratories in which some of the finest bacteriological and chemical studies of our time have been made. There are a score of these association laboratories. They have made preserved foods, bread, paint and dozens of luxuries and necessities better and cheaper. The discoveries become the common property of the contributory members of the association; for it is better to find out from an association laboratory why your can of tomatoes bulges on a grocer's shelf, why your bottled water becomes cloudy and unpalatable, than to go to the wall because your goods are unsalable and your reputation is lost.

When large-scale industrial research is well under way it becomes possible for its sponsors to prepare for the future. It is rarely that a momentous invention or discovery is introduced in less than five years after experimenting begins. Often enough ten or fifteen years pool by before a commercial result is attained. A distinguished mechanical engineer, W. L. R. Emmett, in the employ of a manufacturer of central station machinery, has been working for more than twelve years on a method of generating electricity with mercury vapor instead of steam as the motive agent of turbines, and twelve more may well elapse before power houses can apply his revolutionary principles.

All of the larger electrical manufacturing companies are already prepared for superpower, by which term they mean the pooling of electric energy so that a surplus in New York may be drawn upon to make up a deficiency in Washington. Or to one of three directors of as many German research laboratories and they will tell you that synthetic rubber will probably compete with plantation rubber by 1940, but no supplant it; that New York, Berlin, Paris, London and Chicago will have noiseless streets paved with rubber and that we will use varieties of rubber unknown in nature for hundred of purposes in place of wood, leather cloth and metal.

French as you would learn it in France

If you were in Paris spending six months in a French "pension," it would be a surprisingly short time before your ear would recognize oft-used phrases, and you would soon know their meaning and be able to repeat them glibly and correctly; your vocabulary increasing without effort, without your realizing that you were learning at all.

You would quickly find yourself speaking French as a Frenchman!

Your Ear is The Great Teacher

The Cortinaphone Course is the only method of learning French, Spanish, German or Italian as you would learn it abroad.

It follows the correct principal of training the ear to understand the language, which alone gives a true native accent.

Courses consist of marvelously clear, perfectly pronounced phonograph records and complete home text books from which to learn vocabularies and to follow the spoken lesson.

SOUTH POLE DISCOVERY WAS HIGH DRAMA

Fifteen Years Ago Both Amundsen and Scott Reached This Goal—British Explorer and Party Perished

By WALTER B. HAYWARD

IN the annals of exploration there is no chapter more stirring or more tragic than the race for the South Pole fifteen years ago this month. The busy world has not forgotten Roald Amundsen, the man who has seen both Poles, but only vague memories remain of the British naval Captain Robert Falcon Scott, who lies with four comrades in the ice-sheeted solitudes of the Antarctic Continent. Amundsen planted the Norwegian flag at the South Pole on Dec. 14, 1911. The coveted goal was his. Scott also reached the Pole—but too late. He won great glory, but paid the price.

In a sense the race was accidental. Amundsen preparing to go north, Scott preparing to go south, Amundsen changing his mind overnight, as it were, and going almost unheralded to the Antarctic wilderness—of these elements the drama is made. Then a long pause; the wilderness has swallowed the explorers. Eighteen months pass and Amundsen returns to civilization with a record of complete success. News of Scott is long delayed, and when it comes it is a tale of high hopes, disappointment, disaster, bravery and death, pieced together from the letters and journal found with the Englishman's body.

A Joyless Goal

Thirty-four days after Dec. 14—on Jan. 17, 1912—five men stood on the desolate polar plateau, ten thousand feet above sea level, their southern journey almost ended. There was no joy among them, for they had run across Amundsen's marks and knew they had been forestalled. And in his journal Scott wrote: "The Pole. Yes, but under very different circumstances from those expected."

When Scott made that significant entry, betraying bitter disappointment, Amundsen was within a short march of his base in the Bay of Whales. The Norwegian party had accomplished a remarkable journey with great precision. Not a plan had miscarried, and on the whole the weather had been favorable. But the Englishman was destined never to return to his base in McMurdo Sound. The fates were against Scott and his companions. Gales, low temperatures, rough surfaces, sickness—all combined to bring disaster.

Amundsen reached Hobart, Tasmania, in the Fram on March 7 and announced to the world his discovery of the South Pole. While the world applauded, Scott and his broken men were playing a losing game. On March 16 he wrote in one of his memorable letters: "We have been to the Pole and we shall die like gentlemen." That is the way they died—like gentlemen unafraid.

In the beginning Amundsen's Antarctic expedition bore none of the glamour that marked his flight in the Norge last Summer over the north polar regions. He had, in fact, prepared the Fram for a voyage to the north polar basin. Then, in September, 1909, Peary announced his discovery of the North Pole. The supreme prize of the Arctic had been won. Amundsen decided immediately to go to the Antarctic, with the South Pole as his single objective. He told no one save his brother and the Fram's captain. His financial backers were not informed.

Amundsen wanted no public discussion of his change of plan for fear that the project might be "stifled at its birth." And he had no misgivings so far as Scott was concerned, nor did he worry about the Japanese Antarctic expedition then in preparation. Scott, he argued, had a large scientific program to carry out aside from his purpose to seek the Pole. All this Amundsen makes plain in his book, "The South Pole."

When the Fram left Norway in August, 1910, she carried ninety-seven Eskimo dogs. Oddly enough, no one raised the question why dogs should be taken to the Arctic, although explorers invariably buy them in the North. It was not until Amundsen reached Funchal, Madeira, that he saw fit to disclose his secret. The world was astonished and so was Amundsen's crew; but his sailors readily agreed to go south instead of north and the Fram slipped away on her long voyage. Scott's ship, the Terra Nova, was already on the way to New Zealand, and to his rival Amundsen sent a message of his intentions. The race for the South Pole was on.

The Ross Barrier

The Antarctic Continent is a relic of the Ice Age, covering some 5,000,000 square miles. It is an unfriendly area, with a harsh climate, almost no flora and no land animals. The near-by seas abound with life; penguins and other sea birds find a home on the fringes of this neglected wilderness. Occasional mountains and shore cliffs are free of ice; the remainder of the vast area is armored in white. One of the sublime features is the Ross Barrier, a mighty wall of ice that spreads like a white apron along the northern face of the continent. It is 300 or more miles wide and 350 long, ending in cliffs 100 feet high.

Shackleton, who got within ninety-seven miles of the South Pole in 1909, believed that the Barrier at the Bay of Whales was adrift, but Amundsen did not agree with him. The Norwegian contended that the Barrier was anchored by islands and shoals at that point, and deliberately chose the Bay of Whales for his base, wintering on the Barrier itself. He called his community Framheim. The Bay of Whales was the farthest south a ship could reach and was sixty miles nearer the Pole than Scott's base in McMurdo Sound, an inlet sheltered by Ross Island, which marks one end of the Barrier. Scott proposed to follow Shackleton's old trail across the Barrier, up the Beardmore Glacier and through the mountains to the polar plateau. Amundsen had to blaze a new trail, and, as events proved, his was the easier route.

The most striking difference between the methods of the two explorers lay in their choice of draft animals and here Amundsen scored again. Scott carried only a few dogs and relied chiefly upon Manchurian ponies in his preliminary work of depot laying along the southern "road." Compared with dogs, the ponies were a failure; they worked hard but exhaustion killed them one by one.

Amundsen's dog family had increased to 116 when he reached the Barrier on Jan. 14, 1911, eleven days after Scott had landed. He had a great reserve of strong animals, an intended at the proper time to slaughter a number of them for food. He found many seals at his base and was never worried by the food question.

In the latter part of February Scott heard from one of his exploring parties that the Norwegian had established themselves on the Barrier. He called the news "startling," but determined "to go forward and do our best for the honor of the country without fear or panic. There is no doubt that Amundsen's plan is a very serious menace to ours. He has a shorter distance to the Pole by sixty miles; I never thought I could have got so many dogs safely to the ice. His plan for running them seems excellent. But above and beyond all he can start his journey earlier in the season—an important condition with ponies."

The "Butcher Shop"

Scott's prediction was correct. The sun went and returned and on Oct. 19 Amundsen started for the Pole with four sledges, each drawn by thirteen dogs. By Nov. 15 he had reached the point where the ascent of the mountains began. Five days later Amundsen and his men were near the plateau, and at a spot they called the "Butcher Shop" they halted and killed twenty-four dogs. It was not a pleasant task this killing of faithful animals, but it gave fresh meat for man and dog alike. The surviving animals after their fill, had a long rest and got renewed strength. Ten dogs had strayed and were lost; Amundsen now had eighteen. With these and three sledges he pushed on. He felt sure of his goal. His party had encountered and overcome many difficulties, and now they were on the plateau, with the Pole not far distant. In his book Amundsen describes the events of Dec. 14 in these words:

"At 3 in the afternoon a simultaneous 'Halt!' rang out from the drivers. They had carefully examined their sledge-meters, and these all showed the full distance—our Pole by reckoning. The goal was reached, the journey ended. I cannot say

CHRISTMAS CARD REACHES GAY EIGHTIETH BIRTHDAY

It Has Passed Through Many Phases of Art Endeavor Since Sir Henry Cole Conceived This Popular Memento

By FRANCES D. McMULLEN

EIGHTY bright red Christmas candles should burn cheerily this year over the numberless counters where gay bits of cardboard proclaim the season's goodwill. The Christmas card is celebrating its eightieth birthday. But those who bend over the counters take little heed of the fact.

Nevertheless, the ubiquitous bearer of the age-old wish is not without social honor as it rounds out fourscore years. It has made its way to a place in the field of fine arts and how may be found on the season's exhibition calendar, disporting itself as the handiwork of artists who hitherto have held aloof from anything so trivial or commercial as a greeting card. The Art Alliance is responsible for this lift in its status, and such artists as J. J. Lankes, John Taylor Arms, Peggy Bacon, Thomas Handforth, Ralph Pearson, Walter Teague and Rockwell Kent have taken it in hand.

Christmas cards belong to all men. They find their way to all places and serve many ends. Social leaders send them by the hundreds and kitchen maids by the dozens. In season's best wishes," printed or engraved, business men bespeak patronage and politicians lay up votes. He is a lone creature who does not get his share of cards at Christmas time.

The Card-less Days

The annual greeting card consumption in the United States runs into the scores of millions. The incredible thing, though, is not that the country is flooded with cards carrying wishes in simple statement and elaborate verse, but that our ancestors managed to celebrate without them. What would Christmas be today without Christmas cards? Yet perhaps nothing about Christmas is the subject of more complaints than is the card custom. In moments of stress vows are reiterated that, since Christmas cards have become only a source of trouble and a matter of form, this year's sending will be the last. But next year finds the vow-maker again in line. The joy of remembering and being remembered wins in the end, and the Christmas card multiplies.

Origins of all other Christmas customs except this are lost in the unrecorded annals of folk ways, and many of them are older than Christmas itself. The birthday of the Christmas card has been definitely set in the year 1840, and no shades from the past have arisen to counter the claim. England was its cradle and Sir Henry Cole, who later came to fame as a social and educational reformer, was its father. Already he had set about effecting the application of fine art to manufactures and had gained a name as a pioneer in illustrating children's books with woodcuts after famous pictures. When he got the idea of issuing cards carrying Christmas wishes, he went to a member of the Royal Academy, J. C. Horsley, for his design, and had the card lithographed and hand-colored in London. A thousand copies were printed under his nom de plume, Felix Summerly.

Varied ancestry may be found for the Christmas card. There were lover cards and illustrated note paper and in Germany the illuminated cards sent on Namenstag, the feast of one's patron saint. In 1844 a man of Leith had issued a card bearing a laughing face and "A Gude New Year to Ye," but as this had practically no circulation, it is thought that Sir Henry's idea might have come rather from the "Christmas pieces" written by schoolboys on paper decorated with flourishes and scrolls.

Leafy trellises in Germanesque style divided the first Christmas card into three panels, the smaller side panels showing two of the acts of charity, "feeding the hungry" and "clothing the naked," and the larger central panel, three generations of a family party quaffing wine at the festive board. "A Merry Christmas and a Happy New Year to You" was its legend. It was a lavish bit of work, but no end of criticism was its lot, and it languished. No more was heard of Christmas cards until, in the early sixties, ornamented note paper and envelopes for the holiday trade appeared in stationers shops and soon their designs were stamped in relief in the centre of a card with colored or embossed edges decorated by stencil or by hand.

America, where the Christmas card has taken such hold on the public, followed England's lead only slowly. At the Vienna Exposition of 1873 the flowered business cards of Louis Prang, a Boston lithographer, attracted so much attention that a woman in his London agency suggested putting a greeting in place of the firm name and issuing them as Christmas cards. This was done the following year. Then the Centennial Exposition in Philadelphia, two years later, disseminated the Christmas card idea.

Like dress and interior decoration, Christmas cards have had a history of change and revival in design in the merry-go-round search for novelty. Tinsel appears to have gone and with it the sea-weed, dried flowers, chenille, crewel work and gelatine that decorated the Christmas cards of generations gone. But breathe not too easily. They have gone out of style and come back before. There was a period, now also happily past, when the thing was to be funny in Christmas greetings; and baggage labels, cork soles, cigar butts, extracted teeth, razors and hairpins were reproduced to illustrate puns in Christmas wishes. But apparently this period is not utterly gone, for in this year 1926 a card may be found bearing facsimiles of a holly branch and a cat, wishing Christmas to be "the berries" and "the cat's whiskers" for the New Year. Golfers and polo matches on this year's cards are not new ideas, since swimming, boating, cricket and tennis appeared on English cards thirty-odd years ago.

Holly, mistletoe, robins, and plum pudding have been associated with Christmas cards from the first. Early Christmas cards carried an abundance of medieval piesantries, traceable, it is thought, to the Gothic leaning in decorative art ideals of the day. Toward the end of the nineteenth century, the rococo style, to be seen in every English furniture shop, was also reflected on greeting cards. American cards of about 1911 bore evidences of the recently celebrated Dickens centennial and more lately, with the general swing to Americana, Christmas card designing has gone in for antiques, hoop-skirts, muffs and bonnets, sleighing parties and husking bees. This year many a remembered friend will find Christmas ships sailing in by the fleet, since the ship model is everywhere asserting itself. The Christmas card enjoyed a golden age of art in the decade from 1878 to 1888, but toward the latter part of the century cheap cards of German make brought frosted surfaces and fringed edges to the market, captivating the popular eye.

Enlisting Artists

One of the art events of the year 1880 was a Christmas card exhibition arranged by Louis Prang at the American Art Galleries. For several years thereafter, simular exhibitions were held, with competitions in the artistic merit and popularity of the designs; and such men as Richard M. Hunt, John La Farge and Louis C. Tiffany were sufficiently interested to act as judges. The exhibition of 1884 carried a special feature. The quantity of dilettante work that hitherto had found its way to the exhibitions tended to turn away the best artists, but now their interest was deliberately sought in the hope of raising the level of Christmas card design. Twenty-two artists of first rank were commissioned to paint designs and these were purchased and entered in the popularity contest. Among those whose work was shown was E. H. Blashfield, "the dean of American mural painters," and J. Alden Weir. And the collection was exhibited not only in New York but also at the Museum of Fine Arts in Boston and at the Art Institute of Chicago. But the later influx of cheapness and mediocrity proved too overwhelming for the continued interest of the best artists in Christmas card designing.

A special plea for the Christmas card is now finding voice, calling the best artists in black and white and color prints to bring their talent to the rescue of those who seek relief from hackneyed Christmas card themes.

The New York Public Library took the initiative a few years ago in the movement on behalf of original Christmas cards by American artists, when Frank Weitenkampf, director of the prints room, organized such an exhibition there. The Art Alliance, which for the last decade or so has concerned itself with making contact between the artist and his market and introducing art value into the designs of trade, has taken up the idea since then and, under the direction of Mrs. Helen Appleton Read, held a Christmas card exhibit of artists' prints last year. This year it is offering another on a larger scale, with hundreds of originals displayed in true exhibition style. Here at least the Christmas card is once more taken as seriously as if it were a landscape or a portrait. It is gaining recognition as an exponent of art—a thing to be preserved, not merely registered as a thought from a friend and fed to the waste-paper basket.

though I know it would sound more effective—that the object of my life was attained. That would be romancing; rather too barefacedly. I had better be honest and admit outright that I have never known any man to be placed in such a diametrically opposite position to the goal of his desires as I was at that moment. The regions around the North Pole—well, yes, the North Pole itself—had attracted me from childhood, and here I was at the South Pole. Can anything more topsy-turvy be imagined?

"We reckoned now that we were at the Pole. Of course, every one of us knew that we were not standing on the absolute spot; it would be an impossibility with the time and the instruments at our disposal to ascertain that exact spot. But we were so near it that the few miles which possibly separated us from it could not be of the slightest importance. It was our intention to make a circle round this camp, with a radius of twelve and a half miles (twenty kilometers), and to be satisfied with that.

"After we had halted we collected and congratulated one another. We had good grounds for mutual respect in what had been achieved, and I think that was just the feeling that was expressed in the firm and powerful grasps of the fist that were exchanged. After this we proceeded to the greatest and most solemn act of the whole journey—the planting of our flag. . . .

"Five weather-beaten, frost-bitten fists they were that grasped the pole, raised the waving flag in the air and planted it as the first at the geographical South Pole. 'Thus we plant thee, beloved flag, at the South Pole, and give to the plain on which it lies the name of King Haakon VII's Plateau.' That moment will certainly be remembered by all of us who stood there."

Captain Roald Amundsen.

Amundsen took numerous observations to make sure of his position and in three days was gone. Meantime, Scott was on the long road. The loss of several ponies had delayed him and his southern journey did not begin until Nov. 1. By the end of December all of his ponies were gone, and on Jan. 3 Scott said good-bye to his supporting party and began the trek. He had with him Dr. Wilson, Lieutenant Bowers, Captain Oates and Petty Officer Evans. Between them they dragged a heavily loaded sledge. It was a weary party that found Amundsen's marks—sledge tracks, ski tracks, the traces of dogs' paws, a black flag tied to a sledge runner. Scott set forth his feelings briefly: "It is a terrible disappointment, and I am very sorry for my loyal companions. Tomorrow we must march on to the Pole and then hasten home with the speed we can compass."

The next day (Jan. 18) they came to the Norwegians' tent, in which was a record signed by Roald Amundsen, Olav Olavson Bjaaland, Hilmer Hanssen, Sverre H. Hassel, Oscar Wistling, together with a note from Amundsen asking Scott to forward a letter to King Haakon. In his journal Scott praised the thoroughness of his rival in making sure of his mark and added: "Well, we have turned our back now on the goal of our ambition and must face our 800 miles of solid dragging—and good-bye to most of the day dreams."

Now began the journey from food depot to depot, a heart - breaking struggle with a cruel load through icy gales and over rough surfaces. It seemed as if all the elements had combined to try their strength and courage. On the Beardmore Glacier death came to Evans, after a fall on the ice. "It left us a shaken party, with the season unduly advanced," Scott wrote. But they reached the Barrier, and here Oates, suffering intensely from frostbite and nearly spent, left the tent and walked to his death in a blizzard, hoping by his gallantry to save his comrades. The homeward march was being delayed on his account. Oates had asked them to leave him behind, but they refused.

"I am just going outside and may be some time," he said.

Scott, Wilson and Bowers, all with feet "gone," pushed on at reduced pace. They arrived within One Ton Depot with fuel for one hot meal and food for two days. There they were held up by a blizzard and in their tent they died. It was here that Scott wrote letters to many friends and his "Message to the Public," which surely ranks among the great human documents.

"RE-CREATING ANCIENT ROME"

down at full gallop in the narrow streets. But didn't those grandees lavish free feasts, free Roman punch, free baths and free entertainments upon him? In the heroic days of Rome a few hundred years earlier he might have quarreled with so much paternalism. He might have rebelled against the superstition that his easy prosperity depended on keeping the Imperator party in office. But not in the Rome of the Caesars. Life was very pleasant for a citizen, with somebody else doing the work and paying the bills, and excitment always stirring.

There were the sword fights of the slaves and the captives, the imperial fireworks with Christians for Roman candles, and the sale, on one occasion, of 100,000 Jews taken by Titus at the fall of Jerusalem and auctioned off like so many cattle. And there were the triumphs. One day when Vox had a box seat at the Maximus he saw the Emperor Aurelian come home from the Near East in the following order of march:

Twenty elephants and four tigers.
Two hundred of the most curious beasts to be found on earth.
Sixteen hundred gladiators.
Arms of conquered Asiatic nations.
Plate and wardrobe of Zenobia, Queen of Syria.
Ambassadors from all the world, bearing crowns and offerings.
Captives in native costume.
Captives out of costume.
The Queen of the East in gold fetters, on foot, fainting from the weight of her jewels.
The Queen's chariot.
The Emperor himself in his own car drawn by elephants.
The Roman Senate,
Generals, Judges and other dignitaries.
The rabble.

Ten hours it took that procession to pass through the Circus—ten hours of solid enjoyment for Vox Populi. His fiercely proud cheers come echoing down the corridors of time and still have power to make non-Roman flesh creep.

But Premier Mussolini hastens to reassure us. He will restore Rome to greatness with spade and hammer, not with spear and sword. It is comforting news to hear. Then, too, there is the soothing reflection that Rome was not built in a day.

100 questions which only You can answer

SEND the coupon at once for these 100 Questions. They are of the utmost importance to you—to your health and your future. When you have answered them you will be amazed at the new picture of yourself which will be presented.

QUESTIONS about yourself—questions about your health—questions pertinent to your welfare and your very life. Get the questions—write the answers.

How much do you know about yourself and your chances for a long and happy life? Wouldn't you rather know about the little ills before it is too late to head them off—while they can still be prevented from causing big troubles?

The Life Extension Institute makes it possible for you to know just how you are. The 100 Questions which only you can answer are the questions asked in its standard living-habits questionnaire — questions which the foremost scientists believe should be covered in a thorough health survey.

The health examination of the Institute begins with these 100 Questions. Not until these questions are answered does the actual work of examination by the medical examiners of the Institute begin—an examination which discloses 75 or more additional facts and physical indications. The examination shows you as you are from head to foot—heart, lungs, vital organs, blood, nerves, muscles, bones, teeth, eyes, nose, throat and ears.

In 1913 a group of eminent statesmen, physicians, scientists and businessmen founded the Life Extension Institute for the purpose of protecting and prolonging life. With the cooperation of Harold A. Ley, Professor Irving Fisher, former President Taft, Robert W. de Forest, Eugene Lyman Fisk, M.D., and other forward-looking men of affairs the Institute was founded as a semi-philanthropic, self-supporting organization. Back of the scientific policy of the Institute is a Hygiene Reference Board of leading physicians and public health authorities.

The Institute renders no treatment, performs no operations, but makes a scientific survey of your life and body and submits a report which, if some form of medical treatment is needed, assists your physician in applying the necessary treatment for the correction of your physical defects.

Since the Institute was organized more than 500,000 men and women have taken advantage of this opportunity to make their health better—among them some of the most able men and women in this country. And the Institute has demonstrated that the death-rate among persons who come under this kind of health supervision can be reduced one-third.

Would you like to see the 100 Questions that are asked those who come to the Institute—the same questions that only you can answer for yourself? Send the coupon and we will mail the important data, together with copies of our booklets, "How to Live Long" and "How to Keep Well".

LAWRENCE REACHES THE PEAK

accumulation of an extraordinary collection of the drawings of old masters and other art objects, but the support of his parents and indiscriminate, lavish aid to all sorts of people who asked for it. He tried to become a historical painter like Sir Benjamin West, but could not pull it off—not though he used John Philip Kemble as inspiration for "Satan Calling Up His Legions," and made the Prince of Darkness so terrible that Fanny Kemble—who readily recognized her uncle's high tragedy manner—burst into tears at the sight of the figure on the canvas.

Lawrence admired Fanny, who was just then making her stage début, and painted her. But the real romance of Sir Thomas involved him with Fanny's cousins, the two daughters of Mrs. Siddons, both of whom he also painted and both of whom died very young of what that unscientific age called "galloping consumption." The painter, who had been a familiar friend of the Siddons and Kemble family from boyhood, got engaged to the elder daughter, named Sarah, like her mother. Then he fell into a state of distraction and deep gloom because he felt that he was really in love with Maria, the younger daughter. He told his cruel tale at last to the mother and got her consent—and that of the two young women—to make the change. Sarah, it seems, bore no malice. But, Maria presently dying, Sarah was not long in following her to the grave. Besides the daughters of the great tragedy queen, there was another romance—the heroine of which was a Mrs. Wolff, and there is a Lawrence portrait of her as well. Then there was the lady who, when Lawrence died, put on widow's weeds for him.

Perils of a Court Painter

Nor did the handsome painter altogether escape a scandal touching a higher sphere. The "Delicate Investigation" of 1805 produced an affidavit of her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales setting forth the circumstances of Lawrence's visits to Montagu House to paint herself and her daughter. She says that Lawrence asked to be allowed to remain in the house "some few nights" in order to get started upon his canvas early in the morning before the Princesses were ready to sit. She says also that Sir William Beechey had preferred a like request when he was painting them. In both cases the request was granted and the room occupied by the painter in each case was the same. Lawrence, she adds, did not even dine with her. Nevertheless, a lady-in-waiting has left on record her estimate of "the great danger Mr. Lawrence was in of losing his head." There are, it seems, perils as well as privileges attached to the post of Principal Court Painter in Ordinary.

All of which did not prevent George IV, who was Lawrence's preeminent patron, both as Regent and as King, from assigning to him a most honorable task. The potentates who had just overthrown Napoleon were assembled in London in 1814 and the son of the innkeeper of the White Lion and the Black Bear was commanded to paint them all for the royal collection at Windsor Castle—where, in fact, when the canvases were finished, they were actually bestowed. The great ones stayed in London only long enough to get some of their portraits started. But later, when they were all assembled at Aix-la-Chapelle, Lawrence was sent there especially to finish the job, and a very good time he had and received any number of diamond rings and cyphered snuff-boxes. The Czar, at whose request Lawrence had already been knighted, one day put the pegs in his easel and helped him lift the canvas to its place. That was quite like Charles V picking up Titian's pencil—as Sir Thomas did not fail to recall with proper pride.

Whatever the critics say about it, there's no denying that art and life borrow light and color each from the other. And there is in the life Lawrence painted a deal of color, even if it is not quite so spectacular and splendid as the period which went just before it with its wigs and brocades. Lord Ronald Gower puts it that this was the age which had substituted "pomatum for powder" and in which "the Brighton Pavilion and the First Gentleman in Europe had stepped into the place of Versailles and Marie Antoinette." Lord Ronald says that for thirty years Lawrence painted "preposterously accoutred men and women and seems to have reveled in the ugliness of the fashion." But Lawrence was a man of that fashion. Think of the fashion that Sargent had to paint after him!

One of the very loveliest of Lawrence's portraits is that of Lord Ronald's aunt, the Lady Elisabeth Leveson-Gower, who was later Marchioness of Westminster. She described the painter long afterward as a man of "polished manners with a large cravat and a tinge about him of the days of George IV."

From the royal meet at Aix-la-Chapelle Lawrence went to Vienna to limn the Hapsburg and to Rome to paint the Pope. He came back just in time to be chosen to succeed Sir Benjamin West as President of the Royal Academy. That was in 1820. Fuseli, the Swiss, justified the choice on the ground that "Lawrence could at least paint eyes." Modern experts in "placing" are apt to put the man whose "Pinkie" has just broken the picture-sale record immediately after Reynolds, Gainsborough and Romney in the list of the British masters.

When he died in 1830 he had a very grand funeral, and his collection of drawings by the older masters was dispersed because the British art world was too supine to buy it in for the nation. The rest of his art collection, instead of raking in millions like that of Sargent a century later, brought exactly £15,445 17s 6d. The worst they could say of him, after admitting that he painted "with fidelity, consummate art and acute perception of character," was that he "turned art too much into trade." Perhaps that is why today his art is still very much "in trade."

THE CHEMEHUEVIS WATCH BEANS GROW

WHILE other Indian tribes left the planting of beans and corn to the squaws, considering agriculture beneath the dignity of a warrior, the Chemehuevis long before the coming of the white man tilled their gardens on the sandy shores of the Colorado River with wonderful results. Scattered remnants of the tribe still continue to cultivate the soil. Many graduates of agricultural colleges with improved methods, tools and fertilizers at his command would be proud of a Chemehuevi's garden.

The Chemehuevis' way of planting is peculiar, but it is consistent. A deep hollow, a foot and a half in diameter, is scooped out, and a few beans or some grains of corn are planted in the bottom. When they begin to sprout the green things look like anything but a garden. At the side of the field in which the garden has been made there is always a rude brush shelter in which a watcher is stationed. Without his presence the vegetables are supposed not to grow. Usually the watcher sleeps while on duty, but the fact that he is there is believed to be all that is required to keep the beans and corn steadily growing—without him they would soon wither and die. The watcher remains a certain number of hours and is then relieved by another.

The post of watcher of the crops is regarded as a very important one by the tribe. The Chemehuevis not only work in their own garden, but many of them hire out to work in the white man's gardens as well.

SPAIN CLINGS TO COLUMBUS AS HER SON

In Province of Galicia They Have Accumulated Records And Arguments to Claim Him as a Genuine Native

By JOE MITCHELL CHAPPLE

IN all the story that Italy has claimed in Columbus as a native son to fade before the investigations that seek to prove that Christopher Colon, the discoverer of America, was a Spaniard and not a son of Italia? Even in Washington Irving's time and earlier there has been a shadow of doubt and mystery concerning the nationality and birthplace of the intrepid discoverer, who sailed "on and on, westward from the Azores."

Washington Irving had opportunities of inquiring into the matter when he was Minister to Spain, and he certainly endeavored to get at the truth. In the end he became so convinced of the Spanish nativity of Columbus that he "hesitated to assert that discoverer was born in the Italian city." Several Spanish writers also deny his Italian nativity and claim him as a product of their own land. Among these is Manuel de la Vega. He maintains that Columbus could not speak a single word of Italian, that his name was really Colon, which is indubitably Spanish, but was Italianized, after his successful voyage of exploration, through some very powerful Italian interests.

In the northwest part of Spain lies the Province of Galicia, which is not only interesting because of its natural picturesqueness and the discoveries of prehistoric man and ancient cave life, but because acre for acre it is the richest province of Spain. Down the coast, not far from its border line at Portugal, is the peninsula of Pontevedra, whose records rather conclusively point it out as the birthplace of Christopher Columbus, or, as he always signed his name, Christobal Colon.

A detailed investigation of the life of Columbus indicates that he was never known to speak Italian, and not a scrap of paper remains on which he used the Italian language. His records are all in Castilian, with now and then a colloquial Galician word which would indicate the place of his birth and childhood. It is also noted that in naming the places of his discovery over and over again he used the names of the little towns of the peninsula of Pontevedra in the Province of Galicia. Why should Christobal Colon have chosen names from little places in this distant province? San Salvador, in this peninsula, claims the house he was born in, and San Salvador is the name he gave to a portion of the New World.

The first public record of his appearance is in Portugal, and we know that he married Felope Monis de Perestrello, a Portuguese woman, and lived there. It is indicated that his mother was a Jewess and his father, Domenico Colon, was a woolcomber. The family was poor. Christobal Colon had imagination and the wanderlust. There is a tradition that he headed an expedition to Tunis at the age of 16, and his expedition seems likely to have gone from Galicia. Later records are mentioned showing that he visited Galway, Scotland and England and took many trips to Rome, and went to his so-called native Genoa from there.

With his imagination and growing perspective on men and things, it is likely that Columbus did in Genoa what many men have done at other times in other cities. He took a new name. He decided to change the purely Spanish name Colon for an Italian name. This would take the foreign tang from his personality and it was a good name to conceal anything under. For at the time he took his name there were at least fifty-six families in the comparatively small city of Genoa using the name. He may have "lifted" the name Christopher Columbus completely from one he had heard. In our own day it has happened often.

Further substantiation of the idea that Columbus was thoroughly Spanish is found in the fact that every map he used shows nothing but Spanish words and signs. He "thought Spanish."

The beautiful Portuguese girl he married—and we must remember how close the province of his birthplace is to the border line of Portugal—was the daughter of an explorer, and through the influence of his cousin, the Archbishop, she was of much help in furthering the ambitions of her young husband. Their son was christened Diego; there was nothing Italian about his name.

Furthermore, this coast of Spain, reaching from Pasajes, rounding Cape Finisterre, and so proceeding to the borders of Portugal, is the region that has produced the world's circumnavigators and explorers of the sea. In the Pyrenees, between San Sebastian and Zuloaga's beautiful beach at Zumaya, one finds on a lonely height overlooking the "Cantabrian Sea" a stone monument to the first circumnavigator of the world. On the beach at Santo Porto Columbus found driftwood and strange bodies, and it was his mother-in-law who gave him an old box containing maps and logs of ships, which still further inflamed the faith and aspirations of Columbus. Therefore this reach of seacoast with its grim messages and its mysterious call to something beyond would naturally turn the thoughts of an imaginative, restless boy of Galicia to realms unknown.

Kept Past a Secret

In a book titled "España Patricia Colon?" by Prudencio Otéro y Sanchez, Father Beaumont, Manuel de la Vega and others are quoted as being dubious as to the birthplace of Columbus. Father Beaumont says: "It seems that the Great Admiral wanted to keep secret his past." His genealogy has been built in Italy from his grandfather, Juan Colombo. In spite of this, a pathway exists in Porto Santo in front of the house which is said to have belonged to Columbus. Beside this pathway is a broken stone, supporting a cross. On the stone may still be deciphered: 'Juan Colon RO ano 1490.' In the altar of the Church of Santa Maria la Grande in Pontevedra is a record of the bond supplied in the repairing of the church. It reads: "Os de cerco de Juan Neto e Fuan de Colon fizeron esta Capella."

This document was made before the Notary Alonso Garcia de Sirto and it is filed with the Archivero, D. Rafael Lopez de Haros. Columbus was called Colon in the early letters from the King of Portugal; he is again called Colon in the edict of Pope Alexander VI, in 1493; he always signed Colon to his letters and documents, including the letters he wrote to Luis de Santangel and Rafael Sanches on his return from the first voyage. In every way he personally indicated Spanish mannerisms, and never by accent in speech or written word indicated Italian.

In 1913, Celso Garcia de la Riega, a native of Pontevedra wrote "Colon, Español," being the first historian to claim Columbus as Spanish. His proofs were so convincing that Dr. Rafael Calzada, a member of Parliament (Cortes), a lawyer and publisher, decided to aid him. Autographs of Columbus, copied in his book, clearly showed that Columbus's handwriting had the Spanish and not the Italian outlines of those days.

Graphic Birth Certificate

Innumerable works by members of the Royal Academy of History of Madrid, have followed Garcia de la Riega's book, which have added evidence for the claim of Spain. A commission appointed by the Royal Academy of History, has in its possession a chart of the river that flows into Pontevedra Bay engraved on a stone, which, it is claimed, constitutes a graphic birth certificate of Columbus. He named the first land that he discovered San Salvador. Outside of Galicia there is no other San Salvador. It is often disputed whether San Salvador was not used by Colon in naming his first landing in America in gratitude to the Almighty for his salvation. Why didn't he call it El Salvador, people inquire? As he went on naming new islands, he first complimented the Catholic kings and Prince Don Juan by using their names. We find "La Fernandina," "La Isabela" and "La Juana," after he gave the name of "La Española" and "La Gallega" (Galicia) to some other islands. It is asked why he did not at least christen some of the places after Genoa, if he was born there, or Rome, or Venice, or any one of the ten Italian towns that claim him as their son. On the contrary, he went on naming the Port of Varseos, Cuba, "Porto Santo." If we compare the photographs of these two places, we find them similar. He named a cape in the island of Oncata, "Cabo de la Galera," after a cape in the little island of Beier in the Bay of Pontevedra, and another cape "Punta Lanzada," after a similarly named cape in Pontevedra Bay, as indicated in the old chart inscribed on stone.

The contention may go merrily on for another four hundred years, but there is a feeling that Spain has a claim on Columbus irrespective of awarding him a birthplace. At least, they made it possible for him to achieve that which has made his name famous in history.

The Pyramid Supporting the Temple of Warriors, Showing the Progress of the Repair Work.

SPLENDORS OF MAYAN ART SHINE IN THE JUNGLE

Archaeologists of Carnegie Institution Are Repairing a Great Monument of Ancient Man in America

For more than two years a staff of archaeologists sent out by the Carnegie Institution of Washington has been at work on the Mayan ruins at Chichen Itzá, Yucatan, capital of the New Maya Empire. Frank F. Bunker, editor of the Carnegie Institution, has prepared the following account of the results of the excavations and the new revelations concerning ancient Mayan life from reports of the archaeologists to the Institution.

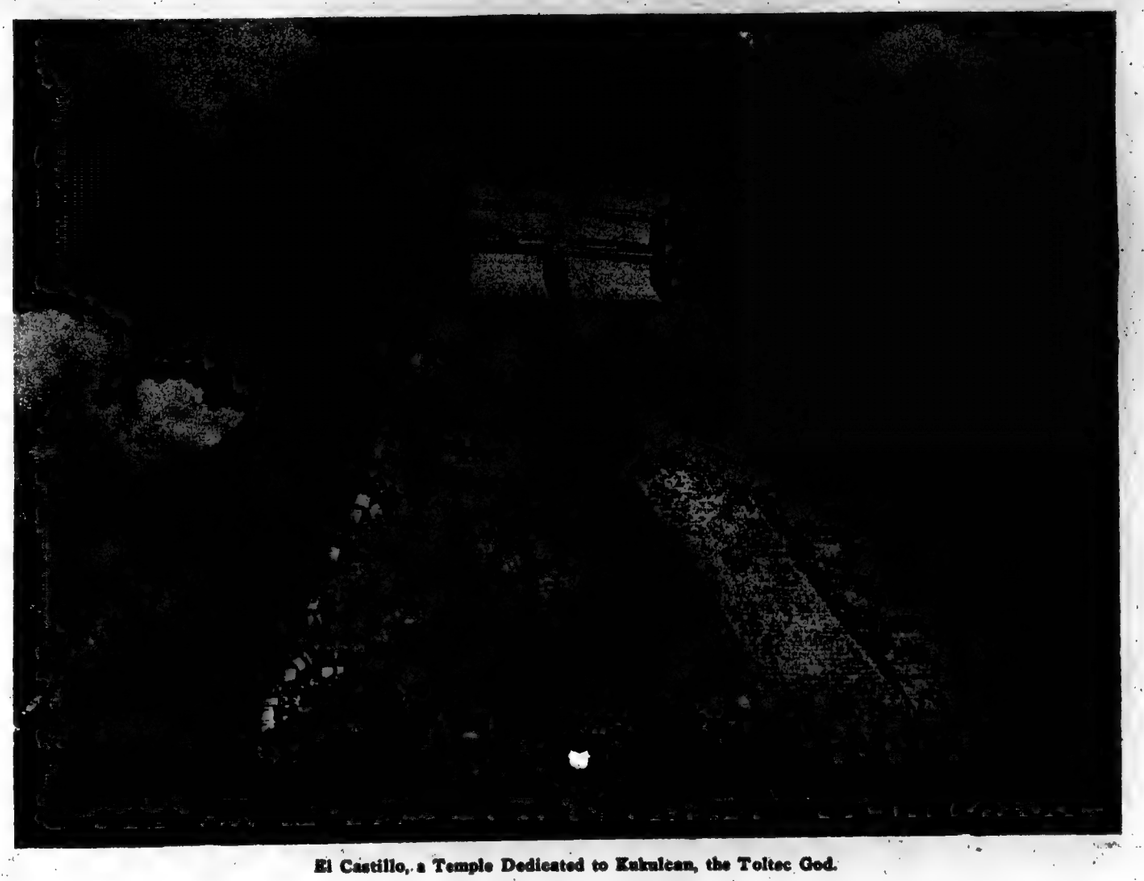
By FRANK F. BUNKER

WHILE there is much about the Mayan people that is not known, nevertheless the secrets of what is now conceded to have been perhaps the most remarkable aboriginal civilization ever developed in the New World are slowly yielding to the patient and persistent efforts of the trained students of primitive life.

It is now known that at the beginning of the Christian era the area south and west of Yucatan swarmed with people who gained their subsistence by cultivating the land. In this region, now covered with a tropical tangle, the ruins of many villages and cities have been found which have been completely swallowed up and lost to view for centuries. It is known also that as early as 500 A. D. these people in great numbers began to desert this land that had been their home for so many centuries. A great migration northward and eastward into the then unknown and inhospitable land of Yucatan followed. What caused this sweeping removal is one of the mysteries that has baffled the archaeologist. It may have been some great change in climate. Perhaps the soil had become too impoverished to support the population. Perhaps a pestilence threatened the people. Or, again, their departure may have been at the command of the gods. No one knows.

As this population wave from the "Old Empire," as the region is called, flowed up into Yucatan, settlements were founded, at first in the southeastern part of the peninsula, and then along the east coast and as far north as Chichen Itzá. In due time many of these settlements became great cities. By the year 1000 A. D. three of these, Chichen Itzá being one, had grown powerful enough to impose their wills upon all the others. A triple alliance was formed whereby the Governor of each of the three participated equally in the government of the entire Yucatan country.

This alliance lasted until 1191 A. D., when a quarrel among the Governors arose, which plunged the people into civil war and brought to a close the "golden age" of the Maya of Yucatan. In the struggle Toltec mercenaries from the Valley of Mexico were called in; Chichen Itzá was overthrown, and as a reward the Toltecs were permitted to occupy and govern the city. Chichen Itzá remained under the control of her Toltec conquerors until 1448, when the inhabitants abandoned the city and moved southward, back into the "Old Empire" region, to what is now the State of Peten, Guatemala, where, at the close of the seventeenth century, they were finally conquered by the Spaniards. Thus ended the independent existence of this remarkable race of American aborigines.



El Castillo, a Temple Dedicated to Kukulcan, the Toltec God.

In occupying Chichen Itzá, the Toltecs introduced new customs, new architectural features, new elements of religion, and new forms of government which in time were interwoven into the fabric of Mayan life. Chichen Itzá, in response to these stimulating impulsions, entered upon a period of remarkable building activity which expressed itself architecturally particularly in the erection of imposing temples and sanctuaries dedicated to the Toltec god Kukulcan. This god was represented by a feathered serpent signifying the union of the god of the air and the god of the earth, that is, the union of a bird and of a rattlesnake.

Dr. Sylvanus G. Morley, head of the staff, is finding that the motif of the feathered serpent is everywhere present at Chichen Itzá, carved in stone columns, balustrades, cornices and bas-reliefs, as well as painted in profusion on the stones which have fallen from walls and ceilings. Indeed, it is this conventionalized representation of the Toltec god that, along with other evidence, enables the archaeologists to fix the time when many of the structures which they are recovering were erected.

Because of the influential place that Chichen Itzá occupied in the ancient Mayan world, because of the wealth of its archaeological material and because of its relative accessibility, the Carnegie Institution of Washington, after several preliminary surveys made in studying the problem, decided to centre its efforts at this point. While its staff is not ignoring other sections and indeed has an arrangement with the Government of Guatemala for conducting studies at certain "Old Empire" cities, so far much of the labor of the excavators has been expended upon the ruins at Chichen Itzá.

The time is short when work can be pursued in the field. Not more than five or six months each year can profitably be employed in making excavations, for the rainy season sets in about June. However, during the three seasons which have passed since active work began much has been accomplished.

After the trees and tangle of vines and grasses had been cleared away it was found that one of the most interesting parts of this magnificent city, which once may have contained a population of 250,000, had been built around a great paved court having an area of perhaps five acres. Surrounding this Court of Columns, as it has been named, more than a thousand columns have been counted, most of them fallen and buried in the wreckage. Each column consists of flat stone disks surmounted by a square capital. It is probable that these columns formed an arcade enclosing what may have been a central market place.

An Amazing Group

Lying somewhat west of this central plaza but extending beyond it, north and south, is an extensive area which is covered with the ruins of a perfectly amazing group of pyramids, temples, palaces and important structures not yet identified. It has been estimated that five years will be required by the present force of eighty workers to make even a satisfactory beginning in the repair of the buildings comprising this group alone.

Meanwhile, the work of the excavators has largely been directed toward clearing and repairing one of these structures, the Temple of the Warriors, so named because the columns which supported its vaulted roofs are covered with sculptured figures of warriors in plumed helmets and armed with spears and clubs, all painted in with brilliant colors. The work of repair has gone far enough to show that this temple was one of the most important in the ancient city, even surpassing El Castillo, the principal temple of Chichen Itzá, in the variety of its sculptured figures and in the richness of its decorations.

Like other temples of Mayan construction, this Temple of the Warriors is built on a pyramidal foundation. This supporting pyramid covers two-thirds of an acre and rises in four terraces 37 feet above the general level of the flat plain upon which Chichen Itzá is located. The stone cornices of the three terraces are elaborately sculptured with jaguars, eagles, men, and as yet an unidentified short-tailed, thick-haired mammal, called, for want of a better name, "The Wooly."

A stairway 34 feet wide and containing 36 steps rises on one face of the pyramid at the sharp angle of 66 degrees with the horizontal. Two stone balustrades, carved to represent the feathered rattlesnake, the tails at the bottom, the heads, with fanged mouths, at the top, flank the stairway and lead to the summit. Here stand two massive feathered serpent columns with heads on the ground and tufted tail rattles rising 15 feet above. These columns divide the entrance of the temple into a triple doorway.

The temple building is 60 feet square and is divided by a single partition running north and south, into two finely proportioned rooms, each 30 by 61 feet. The vaulted roofs which once covered these rooms were supported by twenty square columns of stone bearing the sculptured figures of priests and of warriors. Midway of the partition, a single doorway, 10 feet wide, affords access to the inner chamber, doubtless an awesome place to the trembling religious devotee of the time.

At either end of this sanctuary rests a painted stone bench with sloping back. Against the rear or east wall stands a superb altar, about 14 feet long, 8 feet wide and 2½ feet high supported by 19 human figures of stone painted in colors, with arms raised, Atlas-like, above their heads.

Originally the temple was richly decorated, without and within, in colors of brilliant hues. Traces on every hand show that the Mayan artist employed a bewildering variety in decorative design. The murals, particularly, portray a host of subjects, many of them being scenes suggested by life at the seashore.

E. H. Morris, archaeologist in immediate charge of the excavations, has given particular study to the method which the artists employed in applying the color. He says that they first surfaced their walls with lime plaster of a fine, smooth texture, and while this was still wet a general background of solid color was applied. The designs were then painted flat against the background in a great variety of shades, all, however, being based on a few fundamental colors such as red, yellow, green and blue. As a final step in the process each detail of the picture was re-outlined in black. Except for the reds, which could have been obtained from the bark of certain trees, Mr. Morris states that he has been unable to determine the source of the colors, nor does he know what the medium was in which the pigments were mixed.

Typical Round Columns Surmounted by Square Capitals.

It should be noted that the ruthless forces of nature have long since thrown down and covered over the unit elements which once composed frieze and cornice and decorated wall. Much time and painstaking effort are required to fit together the parts of this gigantic picture puzzle, as Dr. Morley calls it, which is composed not of colored cardboard, but of sculptured stones each weighing from fifty to seventy-five pounds. The work of 1926 has consisted largely in the attempt to restore to their original positions these fallen parts of the Temple of the Warriors.

Along with this replacement, the work of copying the sculptured figures on the columns in the temple was diligently prosecuted. Jean Charlot, a French artist, has devoted the season to this task. He has already made scale drawings of some eighty figures of rulers, priests and warriors which were carved on the columns. For a long time it was thought that the eyes of these figures originally were made of stone or shell inlay but it had never been proved. However, this year M. Charlot discovered one figure in the temple sanctuary in which the eye was still in place. Upon examination he found that it was composed of mother-of-pearl with a small disk of obsidian set at the centre to represent the pupil.

Equally interesting has been the work of Mrs. Ann A. Morris, who has spent the season in copying the paintings on the fallen wall stones, more than a thousand of which have been recovered. By fitting together her copies, all drawn to the same scale, she has been able to reconstruct two different episodes in Mayan life: One a peaceful coastal scene, the other a more sinister one in which a human sacrifice is offered to the bird-snake god.

The first of these scenes shows three war canoes coasting along the shore. In each canoe there are two warriors and a paddler. Fish, crabs, lobsters, even snails, float or swim about in the water. On the shore a village is depicted containing many people who are variously occupied with their simple duties. One woman is pictured in the act of grinding corn, while another is watching a boiling pot. A man is shown carrying a burden, while another is poised as if about to throw a spear. Birds and trees are likewise portrayed. The scene is resplendent in glowing colors and is drawn with much naturalness.

In the second picture a wretched victim lies stretched at full length across the convex surface of one of the coils of an immense feathered serpent having conspicuous tail rattles. Assistants hold his hands and feet fast, while beside him stands the officiating priest with knife upraised ready to strike the fatal blow and tear his heart from his body. The sacrifice takes place in front of a typical Maya temple having the characteristic three-member cornice. Calling around the priest, the great serpent, in whose honor, it may be supposed the bloody rite is performed, with widely distended jaws and protruding fangs, rears his great plumed head high above the horrible scene.

Dr. Morley and his staff confidently expected to complete the repair of the Temple of the Warriors this season, but a discovery of surpassing interest caused a quick change to be made in plans. It appears that while examining a column imbedded in a corner of the pyramid upon which rests the Temple of the Warriors, the excavators came upon evidence that a beautiful structure of an earlier time had been incorporated into the pyramid itself by the builders. Upon digging deeper into the pyramid mass it was found that the stone columns of this buried temple comprised feathered serpents decorated in vivid colors.

The tops and bottoms of the columns, representing respectively the heads and tails of the serpents, consisted of massive stones which had fallen from their original positions and lay buried under the floor of what formerly had been the northern end of the outer hall of the temple. These stones, it should be borne in mind, had fallen centuries ago, when the paint on them was still fresh and bright. In consequence the colors were almost as brilliant as the day they were painted.

Further digging in the pyramid mass disclosed a side wall of the buried temple which was covered with mural paintings, preserved, likewise, in almost their original condition. These murals were found only after the rainy season had set in. For fear that the torrential rains of the Summer might destroy them if they were left exposed, the wall was covered up to await the coming of the next dry season, when a careful investigation will be made of these new aboriginal splendors.

Wall Street corners the Movies

THE Movies hold a mirror to life. Everyone in an audience may quietly interpret the pictured romance and tragedy—success or failure according to the individual experience and ability.

Movie Ticker in turn successfully screens the romance and tragedy of daily price quotations.

By its silently marching pictured ups and downs of prices, it reflects the success or failure of plans and policies of men and affairs perhaps thousands of miles away from any thought of Movie Ticker.

It serves as a drama of equally intense interest to its intent audience as it spells success or failure for their own best efforts.

Movie Ticker pictures quotations in a silently marching stream just as the figures pour from the tape, greatly enlarged so everyone in a busy office may read them.

Without noise or confusion, a contrast indeed to the old-fashioned days of crowding about the tape—or of the favored few with the benefit of a private ticker.

Movie Ticker is in fact a private ticker for everyone.

Only last year Movie Ticker was adopted as an interesting novelty by a few brokerage houses. Today it is used by the New York Stock Exchange, by other Exchanges and by brokerage offices—hundreds of them everywhere.

It is now accepted as part of the machinery of trading by thousands of busy traders.

If your broker does not yet know of the advantages of Movie Ticker from the customer standpoint, perhaps he will appreciate a suggestion from you. We will gladly furnish you with additional facts on request.

MARSHALL, AT 70, LOOKS BACK

gest the news for us and, unconsciously, are governed by their conclusions. Many a man has formed an opinion based on the morning headline. If he had bought another paper his opinion might have been different.

"So I hardly think it surprising that we permit an infinite range of legislation to be enacted without paying much attention. Only when the income tax is to be raised or lowered do we take an interest in government. The trend toward government by bureaus has met little beyond isolated opposition. When we willingly delegate our authority to political parties, Legislatures and Washington bureaus, we should not be surprised to find the Government slipping beyond our grasp. A broad and personal interest in affairs is essential to citizenship."

As a publicist with various international sympathies and contracts, Mr. Marshall is frequently heard on the part this country plays in world affairs. He advocates the League of Nations "with some reservations" and the World Court "without any reservations." He says specifically:

The World Court's Influence

"The League of Nations and its affiliated tribunal are the hope of the world. But for these safeguards, who can say what conditions might obtain in Europe today? Though neither has been able to do more than make a gesture, the gesture has inspired respect. Already World Court decrees have a large moral influence. And what is any court decree? Even the mandate of our Supreme Court cannot be enforced without the influence that comes from respect. The world tribunal has handed down a series of decisions expressive of the highest judicial wisdom. Here is an instrument in the process of forging that must affect the future of every nation and, I might almost say, of every man. Yet we as a nation have no part in it. We stand aside and say that it does not concern us, when we are concerned perhaps more deeply than is any other nation.

"Are we not the wealthiest, the greatest nation in every form of material power? What shall we say if a World Court is created in which we have no part and some day we find ourselves haled before that court? Every principle of American doctrines bids us join the court and assist the League. It is impossible for us to remain apart from the affairs of the Old World. If that conclusion was not established for all time in the recent war, it should be evident to any man who contemplates the radio. Here we have messages flashed around our globe in an instant. Before long we shall see aircraft winging to Europe and back. The seas are conquered by the submarine. The world has contracted beyond any conception of a few years past. Europe is closer today than was Washington to our ancestors.

"If I have any wish to express on my seventieth birthday it is to see the spirit of indulgence among nations. Let us extend the benefits of our institutions wherever possible. Let us cooperate and understand one another. As a nation I do not believe it is in our moral fiber to be selfish or narrow. I shall earnestly hope that we may understand the problems of the world."

Mr. Marshall is short in stature and of the broadshouldered Stephen A. Douglas type—which perhaps explains his readiness to take issue with any assumption that, because of his intense application during boyhood, he missed being a typical boy. He reminds one, a twinkle in his eye, that he was "a good baseball player, and I am yet!" Recalling, however, that he was born in a far different world than that of the present, Mr. Marshall likes to comment on the spectacle he viewed as a youth:

"The first Atlantic cable had not been laid, and Syracuse was a long way from New York. As for Europe, it seemed to me some mythical world. I remember looking at the pictures of foreign cities in my schoolbooks and wondering if those were actual places.

"The average American thought of happiness was in terms of home and of independence for his riper years. We worked longer then, and perhaps harder. Recreation was not the ruling consideration, as it is today. There was little wealth—as wealth is counted now. If a man had a horse and buggy he was considered well-to-do. Two horses and a carriage made him a personage.

"One of my first impressions was thankfulness that I had been born in America. I used to hear my parents and some of their friends talk about the hard life in the Old World, with its privations and denials at the hands of autocratic Governments. I can remember thinking, as a small boy, how much happier my own lot was. It gave me a sense of obligation. I saw the beauty of the American ideal. Its glory illuminated my life. I determined to defend America and American principles with all my soul."

Mr. Marshall's parents came from Germany. After his father had accustomed himself to unfamiliar conditions in the New World, he started a small business in hides and furs. Louis, the oldest of six children, at the age of 8 kept his father's books. He has said that, for his years and for those times, "I became fairly expert in furs." His mother was self-educated, but a woman with a taste for good literature, who knew Schiller's poems by heart. She would have Louis, when he was very small, follow her from room to room, reading aloud to her as she proceeded with the housework. When she stopped to rest he would repeat as much as he could remember. Mr. Marshall holds that this memory training halved the labor of his later school and law education. At the age of 10 he had made up his mind to be a lawyer.

"How did I become a lawyer? Well, books attracted me early. I read everything within reach. At 12 I had joined a debating club. We discussed the Constitution, the Declaration and the founding of the nation. Those debates led me to read a great deal about my country. I became engrossed in the creation of this new nation; was eager to learn how its laws had been drawn and its institutions founded. Then I began to talk about them. I suppose it was a natural transition from the debating club to the bar."

A RED CAP DISCOURSES ON TIPPING

A WOMAN going on a journey begins to enjoy it the moment she reaches the station and encounters a red cap. Into his hands she puts her traveling bag. This is the first thrill.

She is generous with her tips, for the sum for her journey seems sufficient for a generosity she does not always permit herself. All along the trip she is a Lady Bountiful—perhaps on a small scale, but her Ladyship, nevertheless.

"She gave me a dollar," says the porter. "She's on her way out; coming back she may not give me a dime."

"We can pick out those who are leaving New York for home and those who are leaving it to go on a visit," a red-cap at Grand Central was overheard to say recently. "The travelers who have been on a visit here have spent their money and are low in funds. Those going away on a visit are more generous. You see, they are just beginning to peel the roll and we benefit by it. They give us even the smallest and lightest bags to carry when they go out of town; but they carry the heaviest of baggage themselves coming back. They have spent all their money.

"Women are not as generous as men in tipping, but neither do they give us as heavy loads to carry. Times have changed, boss. Ten years ago the heaviest bags belonged to the women; today they belong to the men. Women these days travel light."

SIR THOMAS LAWRENCE REACHES A PEAK

His Portrait "Pinkie" Gets This Year's First Financial Honors and Puts Him in the Best Sellin Class With Romney — British Painters of the Reynolds School Confound Their Critics

Lady Maria Conyingham.

Lady Templeton and Daughter

EXAMPLES OF SIR THOMAS LAWRENCE'S BRUSH.

Lady Peel.

By H. I. BROCK

BRITISH portrait painters of the sort who "sold themselves to the Duchesses"—as our John Sargent was later charged with having sold himself—are now enjoying a new commercial success. Their paintings are being sold at amazing prices to dealers who have in America and in Europe clients to whom a hundred thousand dollars more or less is a trifling sum when it stands between them and anything they have been persuaded to think really worth having.

Critics, speaking in the name of what they are pleased to count "pure art," have for the last twenty years or so used a certain condescension toward portrait painters in general and portrait painters in particular. Undoubtedly the last few years have shown a tendency to revise upward the artistic estimate of the school of Sir Joshua Reynolds. But the things that were said of Sargent when he died two years ago are evidence that the sterner of the critics are convinced (if at all) against their will.

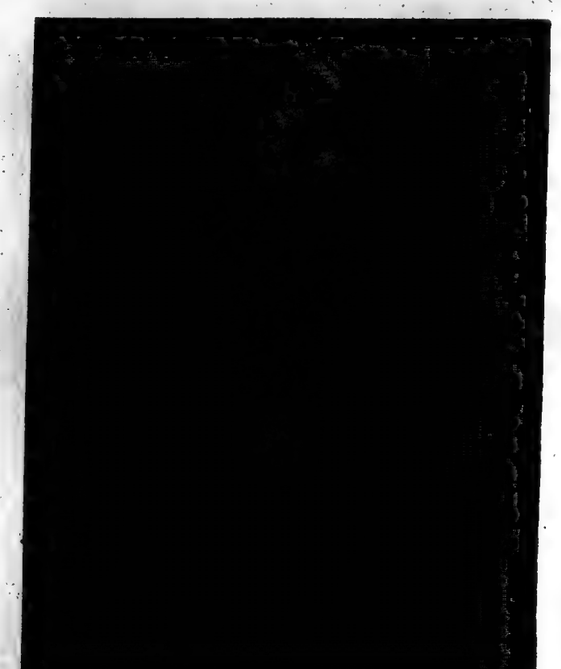
The Year's Top Price

Yet not all their condescension has been able to bear a market, which keeps on going up. The top price ever paid for a picture at a public auction jumps $77,000 within six months. And the top of last Summer and the top of this Autumn are each of them the figure of the sale of a painting by a British portrait painter. Sir Thomas Lawrence wins the 1926 blue ribbon with his picture of Mary Bartlett, done in 1795, and the price is $377,000. The previous winner was George Romney, with $300,000 for his Mrs. Davenport, painted about the time the cabinetmaker's son was putting on canvas so many of the varying moods and endearing charms of Emma, Lady Hamilton.

At the same London sale at which the Lawrence picture (called familiarly "Pinkie" by art fanciers) gets this year's first financial honors, a Gainsborough fetches more than $200,000, another Romney as much, and two more Romneys, a Raeburn and a Hoppner, each around $100,000. Obviously, it will not do to exalt the voice of the auction room over the judgment of the experts in art, but it is a voice which is heard round the world. After a hundred to a hundred and fifty years they are best sellers, these British painters of portraits, who made it their business rather to please their sitters than themselves. In fact, the artist of that day had not yet got hold of the notion that his main business was to please himself.

Most of all, perhaps, did Sir Thomas Lawrence, this year's best seller, seek to please the sitter. If this amiable inclination has been held to impeach his art, let it be remembered that among the sitters he sought to please were most of the beautiful women and distinguished men of his time. In the multitude of them were included Sarah Siddons, his Majesty George IV, First Gentleman in Europe; the Duke of Wellington (with Copenhagen his charger); Marshal Blücher in his boots of that ilk, the Czar of Russia, the Emperor of Austria, Hetman Platoff of the Cossacks, who drove Napoleon out of Russia; Napoleon's own son, the little Duke of Reichstadt, and the reigning Pope, Pius VII; besides Sir Walter Scott, Lady Hamilton, any number of royal princesses and just as many of those duchesses as any painter has ever sold himself to before or since. Perhaps, Lawrence was more of a specialist in duchesses than most. He had a flair for painting women as they like to see themselves and a way with women of his own, though he remained a bachelor all the sixty years of his life—or, perhaps, because of that.

It was said of him that a mere answer to a lady's dinner invitation in his hand became a billet-doux; that he talked to any woman in a voice so soft and low that it was a declaration. This was also said of him by his rival, the painter Opie: "Lawrence makes coxcombs of his sitters and his sitters make a coxcomb of Lawrence." Haydon, another painter, objected that "his women are delicate, but not modest; beautiful but not natural; they appear to look that they may be looked at." Of the last count in that indictment it would seem to match with a nature that is as old as Eve and as young as any girl child that can walk. But no law compels critics to be consistent.



"Pinkie," the Lawrence for Which $377,000 Was Recently Paid.

Certainly, Lawrence stunned himself willingly enough in women's favor, so that if is no wonder he more than occasionally "yielded to the foolish desire of sitters to be painted with a smile." He told Fanny Kemble that because a blush was such a lovely thing in a woman he had wanted always to paint a blush, only he never could—because, whenever he tried, he got only "a red face."

After all, it was not strange that this man should have had his special way with women. A very disagreeable contemporary gallery gossip, who said "he had been brought up on the approbation of a few fashionable spinsters," was wrong. But the mere truth is that from the age of 10 years he had been making pictures of fashionable and famous people, including a great many women who had made a great deal of him. The picture-making began at the Black Bear Inn at Devizes, whither his father had moved from the White Lion in Bristol, where in 1769 Thomas was born. For Lawrence was the youngest of sixteen children of an innkeeper, one with pretentions to gentility derived from his own father, who was a clergyman. Devizes was on the road from Oxford to Bath, in the days of the Beau. It was at the Black Bear that fashionable folk stopped.

Young Thomas, even at 5 years of age, stage-directed by his father, stood on a table and spouted Milton or made sketches. David Ga ick, arriving by post, would ask, "H Tommy learned any more speeches Having listened to a juvenile recita tion of Shakespeare in the garde as he drank his dish of tea, he migh say, "Are you going to be painter player?" Mrs. Siddons, approvin the "beautiful child with his lon fair hair," said solemnly that "h voice was harmonious and his actio just." Mme. D'Arblay, author "Evelina," took note in her journa of two pretty girls, daughters of th innkeeper, and a "lovely boy" of t who was a prodigy at drawing pi tures.

When the family moved on to Ox ford Thomas was already getting guinea for a head. At 12 years old being now established at Bath—Mr Siddons had sat for him as Aspasi and the boy was the rage among th rank and fashion of the town. H turned out with facility oval portrait half life-size, done in colored crayon or black and red lead. By the tim he was 17 he got three guineas for head. At 18 he went up to Londo with a letter to Sir Joshua Reynolds President of the Royal Academy, wa admitted a student at that institu tion and set himself up in rooms i Leicester Fields, where Leicest Square is now. He was then, ac cording to Sir Martin Shee (who go to be President of the Royal Academ himself in due time, but after Law rence), a "very genteel, handsom young man, rather effeminate in hi manner."

The Royal Favor

His price was now ten guineas fo a head, and though Hoppner was a the moment "painting half the lovel ladies in town," Lawrence had mad an admirable beginning. Very soo he had painted a royal personag and so pleased the King that whe Sir Joshua died Lawrence, in hi early twenties, was promoted to th post of Principal Court Painter in Ordinary—previously held by the President of the Royal Academy him self. In 1791, at the King's specia request, though he was under age he was made an associate R. A. H was now fashionably established in Old Bond Street, and his prices ranged from 100 guineas for a full-length portrait to 25 guineas for a mere head.

He went on painting indefatigably for the rest of his life. Yet no matter how high his prices went he never could keep up with his expenses, which included not only th

RARE BIRDS OF THE BLEAK ARCTIC ARE WINTERING NEAR NEW YORK

Snowy Owl, Goshawk, Gyrfalcon and Other Beautiful Visitors From The Far North Are Seen Again After a Long Absence

By CHARLES JOHNSTON

THOSE who delight in the grace and vivid life of birds are rewarded every few years by the appearance in the Winter months of rare and beautiful visitants from the northern fur country and the tundras; great birds, strong on the wing, like the goshawk, gyrfalcon, snowy owl, great gray owl, or birds rich in color—crossbills, pine and evening grosbeaks, redpolls, the gypsy migrants.

We are in the midst of such a visitation, so far as the first group is concerned. Flights of magnificent goshawks have descended on New England, New York, New Jersey, from Maine to the Delaware. Snowy owls have winged their ghostly way to the northern part of this region, and as far south as Barnegat along the beaches. They have never before been seen so early and in such numbers. The swift and splendid gyrfalcon, whose extended wings measure nearly five feet from tip to tip, has been seen in New England and on Long Island. There is a reason for the presence of these wide-winged visitants, to which we shall return. Let us first try to draw their pictures from life.

Long Beach Owls

Two of us made an expedition the other day to Long Beach. Keeping inland, we had watched a company of red-backed sandpipers whirling through the air under the leadership of a big gray plover; a flock of horned larks with bright yellow faces, black-banded, and with rosy shoulders; myrtle warblers touched with yellow, flitting and clicking among the bayberries; countless herring gulls and sea ducks. We were on our way homeward toward the reddening west on the crisp sand of the outer beach between the bristling dunes and the much sounding sea. Along the dunes run telephone poles where red-backed sparrow hawks perch, looking out for mice. My companion suddenly turned and pointed excitedly toward a telephone post. "Look!" he cried, "a great snowy owl!" He had kept a weather eye on the poles because a snowy owl had been seen there five years before; he hoped the lightning would strike twice in the same place.

It did. The snowy owl was there on a crossbar, a white column of a bird against the gray sky, watching us with shining yellow eyes, at least as interested as we were. Then it turned its big, round head away a bit disdainfully, and we went toward it through the heavy sand. The broad shoulders and back and wings were lightly mottled with dark streaks, the black tips of white feathers; the powerful feet with sharp claws, covered with white feathers fine as hair, gripped the crossbar vigorously.

Then the great white head came round again, and the yellow eyes watched with an impersonal stare. The black bill was almost hidden among the feathers of the face. We halted until the bird turned its head away again, and we got still nearer, within thirty feet. Turning once more, the big bird surveyed us, reached an unfavorable conclusion, deliberately opened its immense wings, five feet from tip to tip, like white oar blades, and sailed in effortless silence along the dunes, disappearing a hundred yards away. When we came on it standing upright on the sand, the owl departed, swaying in wide, lovely curves, to a distant crossbar. There we left him in the gathering dusk. A week later three snowy owls were present on the same beach; two more were seen at Barnegat; five in a day, as against three in the same section in the preceding fifteen years. And four were seen at Montauk Point.

A week after the Long Beach walk I was standing with a friend near the palm house in the Botanical Garden. The sun was shining as we looked north over the green hillocks fringed with pines and spruces. Then over the hill came gliding and soaring a big gray hawk, splendid in grace and power. As we watched it with our glasses the bird veered in the sunlight, so that we could see, as clearly as if it had been but a few feet away, the black cap on the crown of the head, the black patch running backward from the eye, the finely barred and streaked underparts, the long gray tail banded with black, the slate blue back and wings. The rush and power of the big bird were superb. We saw it later diving through the hemlock grove; like our cooper and sharp-shinned hawks, its close kin, the goshawk hunts flying low among the trees.

The snowy owl is one of a small group of exceptionally interesting birds that are found all around the rim of the Arctic Ocean. These birds probably go back to Miocene times when the northern climate was very warm, so that magnolias flourished in Greenland and Spitsbergen, before the ring of land was broken between Labrador and Norway. Some of these circumpolar birds, like the crossbills and pine grosbeaks, are brilliantly colored, with mingled flocks of crimson, rosy red, orange, yellow and green, perhaps reminiscent of hot Miocene sunshine. But the snowy owl, ptarmigan and snow bunting, all circumpolar, have donned the white of the glacial period.

In both New and Old Worlds the snowy owl is a bird of the tundra; ptarmigan, lemmings, hares make his bill of fare, with nesting ducks added in Summer. Only when their Northern supplies fail short, perhaps through epidemic disease, do these ghostly visitants swoop south in numbers. Fifty years ago as many as 500 were seen in New England, many also in New York. They came again in 1882-83, and in the Winter of 1901-02 there was an even greater visitation, and many came in 1905-06.

During the last twenty years ptarmigan and lemming must have been abundant; few of these beautiful and essentially gentle birds have been seen until the first week of November of the present year. Now they abound and are noted everywhere; several have boarded ships, some far out at sea. The snowy owl is oddly named Nyctea nyctea by ornithologists, an iteration of the Greek for night; oddly, when one remembers that he spends six months in perpetual sunlight, skimming over the moss and lichen of the tundras, perching on a rock to look for ptarmigan, or gleaning the short-tailed lemming from the moss.

Silent While South

Snowy owls nest on the dry tundra, laying from three to ten creamy-white round eggs, so we may hope their magnificent tribe will hold its own. Their call is said to be "krau-krau," and also a satirical "rick-rick-rick!" but on their southward visits they are generally silent. And they have made their way as far south as Texas and the plains of Northern India.

The swift-winged goshawk, Astur atricapillus, is a hunter of the fur country. His lighter-colored cousin, Astur palumbarius, is spread across Northern Europe and Siberia. Some of the Kamchatka birds are almost pure white. The European goshawk, or goose-hawk (for the first syllable of his name is not an expletive), must have been common in England in earlier centuries, since in falconry it was assigned to yeomen and the well-to-do, while the finer, swifter gyrfalcon was the bird of kings. The peregrine falcon, nearly identical with our duck hawk of the Palisades, was reserved for princes and earls. The little hobby hawk was assigned to the esquire; the merlin was the lady's hawk; the European sparrow hawk, close to our sharp-shinned, sat on the priest's wrist; servants might hunt with the kestrel, or wind-hover, akin to the bird we call sparrow hawk.

The names have got mixed in transit. But to come back to goshawks: they build big nests in the trees of the fur country and dine largely on grouse and hares. It is likely that an epidemic among the grouse of the Canadian forests is the cause of the present goshawk visitation. In the United States there are three goshawks: the bird described, the darker Western goshawk, and the smaller Mexican goshawk in the South.

Of the gyrfalcons one can speak only from hearsay; they have not yet come within our ken, but we cherish hopes. They are splendid birds, rightly allotted to kings, longer winged and quicker on the wing even than the swift goshawk. Two species, including four forms, may possibly visit us, as they sometimes visit the British Isles: first, the white gyrfalcon, which nests on the high rocks of Ellesmere Land and on the opposite Greenland cliffs as far north as the eightieth parallel. It has been seen once on Long Island, at Millers Place.

These birds, gyrfalcons, goshawks, snowy owls, are not regular migrants coming and going with the seasons; they visit us only at long intervals under threat of famine at home. But we have had one very notable migrant in November, a bird with immense white wings that measure seven feet from tip to tip, the quaintly named whistling swan. A dozen or more have been recorded from Long Island Sound and Barnegat Bay; once abundant here, they have been rare in recent years, migrating further to the west from their nesting grounds in the far Northwest to their Winter home on Chesapeake Bay and Currituck Sound.

We have a visitor of another color once more in the Botanical Garden—an Arctic three-toed woodpecker, whose home is in the northern woods. Four years ago he was seen there and again last year, and early this November he came again. One heard him first, tapping loud on a big dead hemlock; then one saw him, a bird as long as a robin, with shiny black back, white underparts finely streaked with black, some white on wings and tail, and a patch of yellow, like a five-dollar gold piece, on the crown of his head. He was turning this way and that, hacking off the outer bark, searching for grubs beneath. On that tree he worked for a week, oblivious of our admiration.

Some of the gypsy migrants seen since early in November; redpolls down near the Narrows; a little family of red crossbills in the hemlock grove, not far from the Arctic woodpecker; a lone pine grosbeak, rosy red, in Westchester. We hope for more.

A VALHALLA FOR RACE HORSES

Champions, Sires and Dams, Lie in a Peaceful Area of the Kentucky Woodland

By LORINE LETCHER BUTLER

KENTUCKY is to have a Westminster Abbey for the departed kings and queens of the turf. At his farm, Hamburg Place, near Lexington, John E. Madden, noted turfman and breeder of thoroughbreds, has established an equine cemetery. It is a memorial of the love of the horseman for the gallant creatures that served him.

A bit of woodland, enclosed by a stone wall in the shape of a horse shoe, has been set aside as the resting place of the horses which have brought renown to the Madden colors. Here, beneath the waving bluegrass and marked by marble slabs, are the graves of Kentucky Derby winners, Futurity winners, champions and the sires and dams of champions.

It is usually the ambition of every horseman to win, once at least, one of these classic events of American racing — a Kentucky Futurity or a Kentucky Derby, with the extraordinary purses that go with them — but in this illustrious group within the burial plot of Hamburg Place there are several Futurity and Derby winners.

A Thoroughbred.

Here lie Miss Kearney, the mother of Zev, winner of the International Race of 1924; Plaudit, winner of a Kentucky Derby, and Sillicon, dam of Silliko, trotting champion of Europe. Here, too, are the graves of Major Delmar, 1:59¾, the trotting marvel of his time and a champion for many years; Ida Pickwick, the champion race mare of the West, and Imp, called the Black Wonder, champion mare of the East, and Star Shoot, Ogden and Lady Sterling—famous in the history of racing.

In the centre of the graveyard stands an imposing monument to Nancy Hanks, the world's champion trotter of her day. Nancy attained such celebrity that even though many years have elapsed since she reached the zenith of her fame, the use of her full name is not necessary in designation. "She traces to Nancy" is clearly understood by all horsemen as a reference to the great Nancy Hanks, 2:04. Atop of the monument is a bronze statue of this famous trotter, executed by Carey Rumsey, a lifelike and forceful bit of sculpture.

Kentuckians reckon the passing of time not by years, but by Kentucky Derbies. "He married in the year—jet's see." He strokes a reflective chin as he muses. "The year—Old Rosebud won the Derby." And he knows to a dot the year his father-in-law died, or the tobacco had rust, or the great hail-storm, or the year it snowed in May—because that was the year that Plaudit, Day Star, Black Gold, George Smith or somebody or other won the Derby.

Racing and politics are his favorite sports—it is hard to tell which he loves more. The earliest settlers of Kentucky brought with them the traditions of their Virginia and English forbears in respect to the production of fine live stock—thoroughbred cattle, thoroughbred sheep, thoroughbred horses, hunters, saddle horses and race horses.

There is an element in the fertile limestone soil and the amiable climate that contributes to biological excellence. So Kentucky's reputation for blooded stock was early established. Kentucky saddle horses and Kentucky race horses attained pre-eminence by competitive performance in show ring and on race course. Owing to favorable conditions in Kentucky many of the foremost breeders of the thoroughbred in America established farms in the bluegrass region. The value of thoroughbreds in Kentucky is probably 80 per cent. of that of all the thoroughbreds in the United States.

These farms, such as Mr. Madden's Hamburg Place and R. T. Wilson's Kirklevington, are models of beauty. The bluegrass pastures are as carefully kept as a city park—without the accompanying disfigurements of peanuts and papers. Stables and paddocks are affairs de luxe. The thoroughbred is a pampered creature, the object of assuduous attention. Aside from meticulous grooming, the most careful account is taken of such matters as feeding and exercising.

No less than three personal attendants are necessary to the welfare of a thoroughbred. There is the foreman, the exercise boy and the night watchman to report its condition through the night, for any sign of restlessness or nervousness is indicative of overwork or indigestion.

Though horse racing was popular in old Greece and Rome, England developed what is called the thoroughbred, and from Arabia came the first stock. The modern horse, however, is vastly superior, not only in fleetness, but in size and conformation, to his Arabian ancestor.

Endurance and early maturity are characteristic qualities of the modern thoroughbred, and for this reason a thoroughbred cross improves every type of horse. A horse is thoroughbred in America when five generations of his ancestors have been recorded in the studbook. In Great Britain and Ireland the necessary ancestry is seven generations.

An average horse does not reach maturity until four or five years of age; but, with thoroughbred crossing, a colt is fully grown by the time he is three years old and ready to earn his board. Fifty years ago a race horse was not ready to begin his career until he was four or five years old; but, through judicious crossing and training, he now races as a two-year-old and is considered mature at three.

Otherwise breeding is uncertain. "Highbred mares," says The Thoroughbred Record, "may be mated with the most expensive sires and worthless ones with the same horse, with frequently the worthless union doing best."

ONLY BRIDGES LEFT

ONCE the Arkansas River, flowing from the Rockies to the Mississippi, was a mighty stream, which flooded its banks in Spring. Then came irrigation, and the Arkansas was tapped at many places in Eastern Colorado. The formerly majestic river is little more than a sandbed now.

Recently some motorists drove from Hutchinson to Wichita, a distance of about eighty miles, in the bed of the Arkansas River. Detours were made only when the bridges were so low the car could not go under them.

"Why doesn't the Government make an appropriation and convert it into a speedway?" asks a Kansas editor.

MARSHALL LOOKS BACK OVER 70 YEARS

Noted New York Lawyer Portrays Striking Differences Between Present Life and That of His Youth

BY JAMES C. YOUNG

LOUIS MARSHALL, who has attained a notable place as lawyer and authority on the Constitution, celebrated his seventieth birthday on Tuesday. It is forty-nine years since he pleaded his first case, and in that period American life has been a swiftly moving spectacle. Not many men have watched the marvelous panorama with more comprehending eyes than has Mr. Marshall.

In Mr. Marshall's boyhood debating clubs were popular. A juvenile debating club of Syracuse, N. Y., had an unusually precocious member, a boy of 12, the son of immigrant parents. His favorite subject was the Constitution, and with boyish arguments he defended it against any and all comers. That boy was truly father to the man, for his name was Louis Marshall, and in the round of years he became an authority on the Constitution. Indeed, in a career of distinction as a lawyer Mr. Marshall is best known as a stout defender of the Constitution, whatever is at stake.

Today Mr. Marshall is believed to have argued probably as many important cases involving constitutional questions as has any other lawyer in the State. At the Peace Conference in Paris he drafted and worked to have adopted minority treaties that have gone far toward protecting the lesser racial groups of Europe. He is frequently quoted on public questions and has contributed to philanthropic enterprises in the matter both of aid and of leadership.

Mr. Marshall was born in the old Seventh Ward of Syracuse and completed grammar school and high school there, after which he went to work in the law office of Nathaniel B. Smith. The shelves of the old-school lawyer's law books and the Court of Appeals library, overlooking what had been the village hay market when Syracuse was "Comstit's Corners," proved a treasure trove to the ambitious youth. After two years of hard reading, he came to New York, completed the three-year course of the Columbia Law School in one year and returned to Syracuse. In describing this period Mr. Marshall says:

"I determined to read law, and the next few years were some of the happiest in my life. I got to know the inside of the lawyers' offices in Syracuse and the books they had upon their shelves. Best of all, I liked to visit the office of Judge William C. Ruger, afterward Chief Judge of the Court of Appeals. He always had a new book to lend me; always a cheery word to give. He was a great man in my eyes, and I never forgot a word of his helpfulness. After leaving high school in Syracuse I came to New York, went to Columbia Law School, and returned home. Judge Ruger gave me a place in his office, and so I got started."

As illustrating the changed practice of the law—today and as contrasted with yesterday—Mr. Marshall related an experience that befell his mentor and friend, Judge Ruger.

"New York used to have courts of law and courts of equity. Cases were shifted from one to the other and back again. Judge Ruger was pleading a case in common law when the presiding judge interrupted him to say: 'But your pleading seems to embrace the principle of equity.'

Judge Ruger, a little flustered by the interruption, answered vehemently: 'Your Honor, I object to any principles of equity in a law suit.'

"Nowadays equity is the controlling factor," Mr. Marshall continued. "Judges and juries are inclined to reach decisions according to their understanding of a case, governed by the rule of justice as they comprehend it. This does not mean we are going to do away with all the rules of law, but it does mean that the practice of lawyers and courts is less governed by technical considerations. Better justice? Well, that is hard to say. Certainly it is common sense justice, as the average man would apply it."

Mr Marshall might have told that within two years he became Judge Ruger's partner. He came to be known as a "rising young man" in upper New York legal circles. His practice grew. Finally, in 1894, he came to New York, and since then has been identified with a wide range of corporate law and has performed services for civic bodies. But the round of everyday legal affairs never diverted attention from his first inspiration: the history and institutions of America. The Constitution and all that it represents is the foundation of his reason and logic.

When asked whether, in his opinion, the Constitution applies to conditions of life today as it applied to conditions 150 years ago, Mr. Marshall enthusiastically warms to his answer:

"It is the enduring document of all time. Its application in another century and a half will be as fresh as it is today. Fundamentally it embraces the natural rights of man, and these will never change. We have a means provided in the Constitution for such additions as may be needed. But I believe we shall undertake new amendments with more caution in the future. Our experience with the Eighteenth Amendment has shown us that we acted too hastily. Its passage was an invasion of State rights and gave to the nation police powers that the framers of the Constitution never intended.

"The amendment was faulty legislation and never should have been passed. But now that it is a part of the Constitution we must enforce it with all the vigor of which we are capable. To obey certain laws and disobey others is impossible if we are to maintain organized society. The Eighteenth Amendment is a most important law. Those who would see it changed are fully within their rights and Constitutional guarantees. The means has been provided. Two-thirds of the two houses of Congress, or two-thirds of the State Legislatures, may propose an amendment undoing the work of the other. When three-fourths of the Legislatures vote for such a measure, it will become law—a new amendment.

"I am aware that the present amendment and its supporting laws are disregarded by a considerable number of the American people. Results will be more far-reaching than they suspect. I would plead with them to sacrifice their tastes—natural though they may be—in behalf of our institutions. Any man who breaks the prohibition statutes upholds an evil example to every person acquainted with his act. The ignorant and the vicious are encouraged. Thus we have the whole structure of the law brought into peril. I am not one of those who believe that a law once passed is irrevocable. But so long as it remains a law, just so long it must be obeyed."

Mr. Marshall does not favor the proposal to place constitutional amendments in the hands of the people. He believes the State Legislatures are better qualified, by knowledge and information, to dispose of such grave matters than is the body of the electorate. But he regrets the somewhat limited interest of the average citizen in affairs of government.

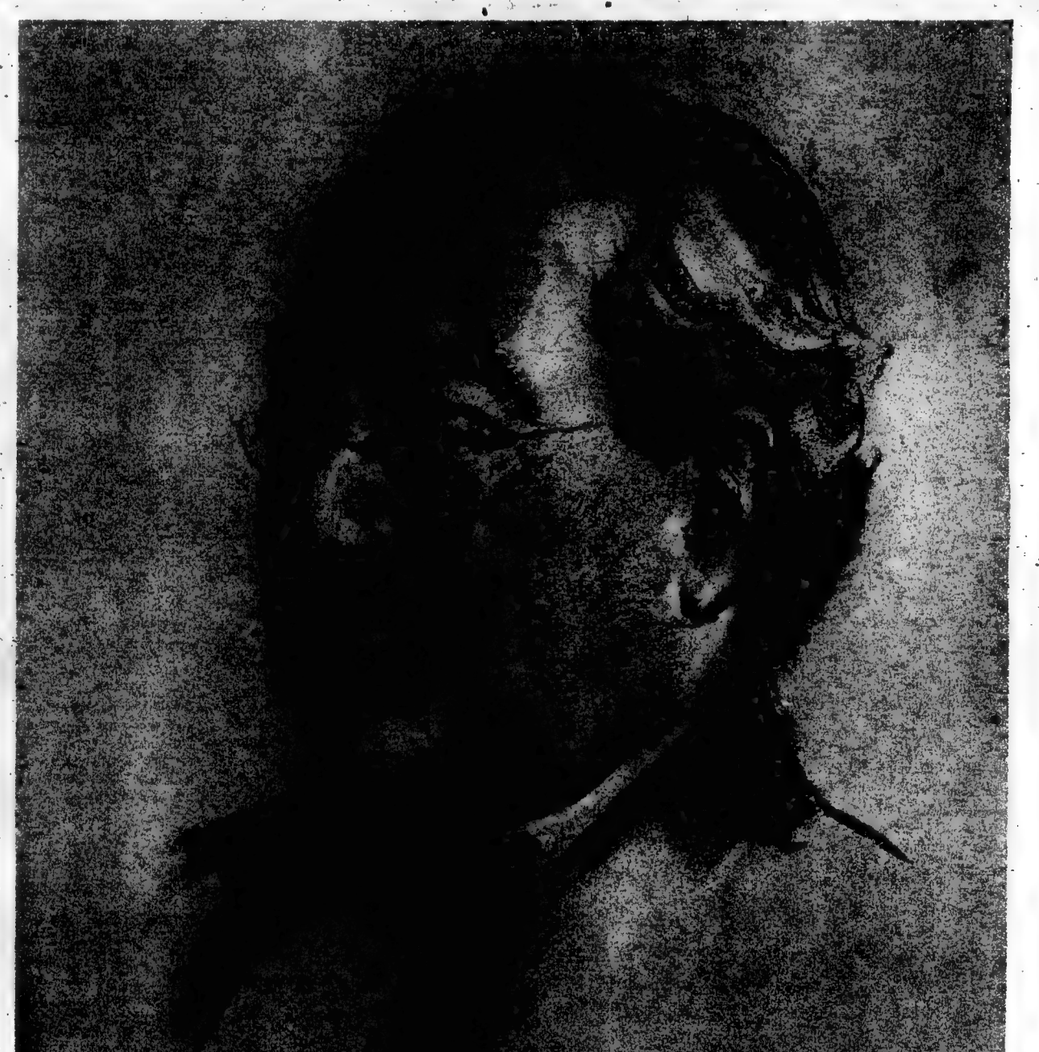
"The typical American is ready to defend his country at any time, need may demand," says Mr. Marshall, "but except at moments of crisis he is too willing that others should run it for him. Here is a marked change in the American people. In my youth people knew more about the Constitution and about each by national struggles than is the case today. It is true that we were close to both in point of time, but we were not so close as to be able to learn by first-hand information. Teaching was more thorough; reading upon such subjects was more general. And men discussed these matters with something of reverence. We had few distractions. The radio and the movies had not been created to bring us the latest football scores or the new drama of high life. We lived in a more self-contained world, a more earnest world.

"Now, I would not find fault with the present; but I doubt whether many chances of happiness today equal his chances of fifty years ago. He moves faster and in wider circles—though I sometimes wonder whether he does not miss a great deal on the way. We are moving so swiftly that we seldom pause to look about us. This national haste takes our minds away from public affairs. We become content to let others govern us without much choosing on our part, as the Romans were content that others should defend them. Every citizen has a definite duty to perform. Every citizen is responsible and should take part in his country's affairs."

Mr. Marshall carried on the legal fight that prevented the proposed referendum on a five-cent fare from going on the ballot at the last election here. Representing Frank J. McCabe, a taxpayer, he brought mandamus proceedings to prevent the Board of Estimate and Apportionment from introducing the question at the polls. The Court of Appeals upheld Mr. Marshall's plea, reversing the previous decision of the lower courts. He is accordingly not without opinion on the proper limitation of governmental authority. In this connection he observes:

"One result arising from lack of interest has been the tendency to centralize power in Washington. The police authority assumed by prohibition regulation is an example. Who can believe that the framers of the Constitution ever expected it to serve such a purpose? Or who could believe that the proposed child labor amendment lay within their purview? Another step advocated toward centralization is the uniform marriage and divorce law. Regulation of business in many aspects is still another reflection of the tendency.

"When I was a young man the privileges of States were strongly defined. Such legislation as this would have stirred public interest everywhere. But almost any phase of it can be passed now without any particular public attention. We live by the headline age. Newspapers have become so big that we cannot possibly read them, so we merely look at their headlines in a twenty-minute ride every morning. Meanwhile, the activities of our lives have increased tenfold, until there is ten times as much to read, and perhaps more. But we let the headline writers do



Louis Marshall.

BUTTERFLY TABLES ARE POPULAR AGAIN

Colonial Vogue Brings Dainty Models Back—New Wallpaper Designs for Children—Oriental Pictorial Rugs

A Child's Room Where the Motif of the Wallpaper Border Is Repeated on the Furniture.

By WALTER RENDELL STOREY

REVIVED from our Colonial past, the butterfly table is once more becoming as useful and as universal a piece of furniture as it was in New England in the eighteenth century. A distinctly American product of the joiner's art, this form of "flap table," with its two leaves supported by a triangular-shaped wing, from which it receives its name, may now be had in many forms, including modern adaptations of the old designs as well as careful reproductions.

Just now butterfly tables are popular in maple—one of the many woods in which it was found in the past. Pine as well as cherry, and, in rare instances, oak, were also employed in its early manufacture. To pick up an old butterfly table nowadays is good fortune, for antiquarians in recent years have cornered most of the fine examples. A table had to be both hardy and lucky to live through the years when furniture of humble woods and simple craftsmanship was not valued very highly.

Low and Light

Often in the old days the butterfly table was made low in height as well as wonderfully light. These characteristics fit its modern copies well for use as a coffee table or a convenient bit of furniture, to place by a couch or the side of an easy chair to hold books, magazines or smoking paraphernalia.

Characteristic of the table are the legs slanting inward from the side, graceful and deeply turned. A generous overhanging of the top at each end is also a good point, as well as thinness of wood in top and in wing.

Many of the old pieces had a small drawer, always provided with a wooden knob, and in some cases made with slanting sides to conform to the lines of the slanting legs. The stretchers, placed near the bottom of the legs, were generally of unturned wood, although beautiful examples of turned stretchers have been discovered. On the old tables the many generations of feet that have rested on these conveniently placed stretchers have rounded the top edge, and this mark of the antique has now become a decorative touch on the modern reproductions.

The butterfly table in its smaller sizes finds a ready and constant usefulness in the modern home. One can hardly have too many small tables, and the butterfly with its two side leaves may be made to contract or expand itself. As an end table for a couch it gives, in its simple and natural finishes of wood, just the proper contrast to the upholstered furniture, and in a room with other furnishings of a Colonial type it aids tremendously in recalling the old-time atmosphere.

Butterfly tables seem to have first appeared about 1700, although, from their similarity in line to Jacobean furniture, they may well have been made long before that. Tables with leaves came into use in England almost a century before our earliest known butterfly table, and the gate-leg table—a distant relative of the butterfly—was developed about the middle of the seventeenth century.

Most of the butterfly tables that have come down to us have been traced back to Connecticut, although other parts of New England have contributed a few examples. In the early days furniture was always made to order by local carpenters or cabinetmakers, a method of manufacture which accounts for the delightful variation in design among the antique specimens that have survived 200 years of use. One finds many styles of round-topped tables, oval and square-sided ones with the wings showing great diversity in form. Some of the wings are cut in a simple, graceful curve, while in others the outer outline is made up of double curves suggesting the outline of classic molding used so much in later Colonial furniture.

ECLIPSED for a while, wallpaper is now being used where special effects are desired that paint or tinted plaster do not give. One part of the home in which wallpaper is especially appropriate is the rooms where children sleep or play. Here the pictorial element it provides allows not only for charming effects in decoration, but, what is equally important, permits the surroundings to suggest the gayety and charm of the imaginative land of childhood.

That the decoration of children's rooms is now a serious business is shown in the attention that designers are giving to papers for them. Other sources for designs are being sought than the traditional Mother Goose. Peter Pan may now be found in wallpaper for the play room of girl or boy, wherein all the adventures of that gay sprite are set forth with a delightfully romantic touch. Less strenuous is a new paper showing tiny elves who, seated along the lower part of the papered wall, fill the balance of the surface with iridescent bubbles from their tiny pipes. The drawing of the figures is simple, the bright colors are combined attractively so that the pattern possesses that flatness of effect which is an essential of good wallpaper design.

Another pattern has delightful silhouette figures in black of children at play, who wander over the surface of the paper, in and out of rose-covered arbors, with their geese and dogs and cats. For a room in which one might want to bring back something of a Victorian air, the Kate Greenaway designs have been revived. These delightful mid-Victorian children and their amiable nurses are seen in all the charm and variety of activity that the clever English artist put into her drawings of the child world.

Rich Two-Tones

Where plain walls are desired two-toned papers may be had, which give in many different tints a rich depth of surface. Or a popular design is an old-fashioned pattern of dots which, with a border of colored figures, perhaps of Jack and Jill and Little Red Riding Hood, create a quaint effect.

Sometimes, in a room with painted walls or paper of a solid color, a paper border of dancing children or characters from Mother Goose may be used. When a border is employed, the best place for it is low on the wall so that the children may easily see the figures. About half way up the window frame is a good height for these decorative borders. Sets of long panels depicting familiar folk tales of childhood make excellent decorations, as these oblong prints may be pasted end to end on the wall and provide a colorful frieze.

Borders of figures in silhouette provide an opportunity for a distinctive effect. They may not only be used as a continuous decoration around the room, but when the figures or groups are cut out and used separately they may be placed in spots on the wall above a mantel, over a low window, or arranged in a circle they will make a fanciful garland of children on a blank wall.

Cut-outs taken from either the wallpaper itself or the border decorations, furnish a convenient and attractive way of ornamenting the furniture. When plain, simple woodwork or painted furniture is used, these little groups or single figures may be pasted on headboard and footboard of bed, on chair backs or on the fronts of bureaus. Varnished over to protect from grimy hands, they make a charming and durable addition to the decoration of a child's room.

In the children's play room, as distinguished from their sleeping rooms, an even greater variety of wall coverings and decorations is being used. One may have the entire wall covered with a heavy canvas on which pictures, home-made or cut from magazines, can be readily pinned or tacked. In one play room, sketched right on the wall, an artist father created an imaginary land of childhood with all the animals of Noah's Ark solemnly placed in line along the lower part of the sketch. Less talented parents might call in a decorator or, with the aid of little Mary and John, make up a pictured land of imagination with the aid of scissors and printed pictures.

As in any room of the home, the color of the paper or paint to be placed on the walls should be carefully considered before the room is decorated. Beautiful greens and blues, or paper in which much lavender is used, while appropriate enough for well-lighted rooms, should be shunned if the room has not much sunlight. Yellows and tans and rose colors—all the warm hues—are the ones to pick from to increase the cheerfulness of a room without much sun.

A PICTURESQUE addition to the variety of hangings—and in some cases floor coverings—now available for the foyer or living room are the pictorial Persian rugs which are now coming from the East into the Western rug marts. Not many of these rugs have been seen in America in the past, for Oriental rugs of geometrical or floral patterns have always claimed the greatest number of admirers. But in the Near East, where the rug has from time immemorial taken the place of the painted picture and tapestry with its story-telling designs, these rugs at

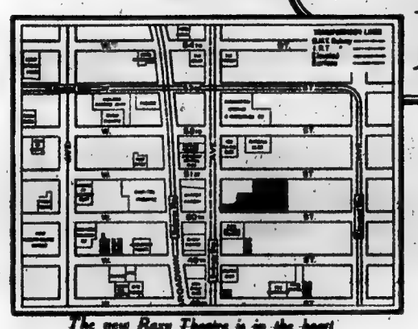
Unique Features of The ROXY THEATRE



The new Roxy Theatre is in the heart of the Times Square theatrical district.

The Main Console of the huge Kimball organ with "Roxy" standing beside it.

The Seven Wonders of the Roxy Theatre

I. The Theatre Itself.
The size is larger and the design superior. It seats over 6,000 patrons and provides every facility known for their comfort and safety. Its architectural beauty and elegance of appointments are unsurpassed. The rotunda opening from the entrance lobby is capable of accommodating 3,000 persons in comfort and with musical entertainment while they wait admission, assuring patrons for the theatre proper as vacancies occur. The marquee, 400 feet long, affords protection from the weather to patrons awaiting their turn to pass the ticket booths in the entrance lobby.

II. The Pipe Organ.
It has three separate consoles and is operated by three organists, allowing a range of music production never before attempted.

III. The Orchestra Pit and the Stage.
The orchestra pit will seat 110 musicians, and may be raised and lowered at will. The stage is divided into sections, so that one act may fade in and another out simultaneously, avoiding all intermissions. It has different levels, so that chorus, ballet and screen may all be shown at the same time.

IV. Technical Facilities.
The special lighting equipment and the "screening" machinery are revolutionary, under a plan invented and perfected by Roxy.

V. Broadcasting Studio.
Under the stage a complete broadcasting room is built, equipped with organ, piano and special percussion instruments; and Roxy and his Gang will be on the air again with more favorable hook-ups than ever for radio entertainment.

VI. Real Public Ownership.
Over 4,000 stockholders directly own the theatre. No other theatre in New York is so completely owned by the public. Prior to the opening, which is scheduled for February, the list will be increased to over 5,000. There is, accordingly, popular financial interest in the theatre.

VII. Roxy.
Mr. S. L. Rothafel is an institution. He is the acknowledged leading Moving Picture showman of the country. He is popularly known to millions of radio enthusiasts. His financial and artistic successes while directing the Strand, Rialto, Rivoli and Capitol are a matter of record. Now he has fullest scope for his genius. He is independent and has associated with him able, experienced and resourceful men.

We offer for investment units of stock that make you one of the owners. Class "A" stock is entitled to cumulative preferred cash dividends of $3.50 per share per annum and participating dividends with the common stock to the extent of an additional $1.00 per share. Dividends of $3.50 have already accumulated.

With each 3 shares of Class "A" stock you will receive one share of Common Stock.

Estimated yearly net earnings amount to $2,100,000, or over four and one-half times the requirement for the Class "A" preferred dividends. This indicates approximately $4.00 available each year for dividends for each share of Common Stock, which has cost you nothing and already has a real market value. The Theatre reaches its full earning power immediately upon opening.

Based on appraisal of the property, the value of the tangible assets amounts to over $45 for each share of Class "A" stock.

Increase of market value of Roxy Stocks should be great when the Theatre is opened. Moreover, 15% of net earnings after preferred dividends must be used to retire Class "A" stock, which is not callable for less than $50 per share. The Corporation has agreed to make application in due course to list the shares on the New York Curb Market.

EUROPE LOSES GAME BIRDS

International Protective Committee Moves To Save Them From Quick Extinction

LONDON.

THE frequently criticised British land régime has found a friend at last. Ornithologists, who are deeply concerned over the excessive slaughter of European game birds, say that the big estates of Britain serve as reservations for birds and that the big land owners who shoot the birds during the open seasons are the men who most effectively preserve them during the closed seasons. The richness of British bird life, they say, is therefore indirectly, and perhaps solely, due to the British land régime. "As soon as these larger landed estates become broken up," says Percy R. Lowe, British member of the International Committee for the Protection of Wild Birds, "just so soon will the knell of all kinds of game and wild fowl have sounded, for then indiscriminate shooting and poaching will have become general and valuable national food assets will have disappeared, never to return."

Black Grouse.

Elsewhere in Europe the committee of which Mr. Lowe is a member finds game birds threatened with extermination. The breaking up of large estates throughout Eastern Europe has deprived the birds of their once safe reservations, and during their Spring and Autumn migrations they are now harried all the way from Egypt to Sweden and back again. Fast trains, refrigerator cars and cold storage facilities have so increased their sale that they are believed to be doomed unless the traffic in them can be restricted by the prompt action of all the nations involved. Accordingly, the international protection committee, which was appointed at the meeting of the International Ornithological Congress in Copenhagen last May, is to meet in London some time this Winter to draw up protective legislation and to submit it to the Governments of the Continent.

"In the United States," Mr. Lowe says, "there are thirty-three Federal reservations frequented by wild ducks, comprising about 3,483,000 acres, where shooting is prohibited. Six million shooting licenses are said to be issued annually in America, but ducks are, nevertheless, on the decided increase. The explanation will be found in the fact that the path of preservation in the United States has led back along the trail in the direction of the large landed properties of Great Britain, for it is more and more the custom for large and rich shooting syndicates in the United States to rent large areas of wood, marsh and lake on a scale undreamed of in England, so that the result as far as the preservation of wild ducks is concerned is essentially identical."

Mr. Lowe does not believe that measures of this sort would be practical politics in Europe nor, even if they were practical, does he believe that they would meet the European problem.

"Our enemy," he says, "is not the sportsman, but the man who kills for the market. The sportsman is one of the best protective agencies we have, a fact which is amply borne out by American as well as by British experience."

It is the wholesale commercialization of the slaughter of game birds in Europe, the growth of the traffic made possible by refrigerator cars, fast trains and cold storage warehouses which, in Mr. Lowe's opinion, threatens the European wild duck with the fate which a similarly unrestricted commercialisation has visited upon the whale at sea. The netting of birds in the Baltic and North seas and their trapping along the southern shores of those seas are, in his view, practices that require immediate restriction. The result of these practices moved Dr. Einar Lönnberg of Stockholm last year to submit protective proposals to his Government, and the appointment of the international protection committee in Copenhagen last May was the direct result of proposals submitted by the Swedish Government to the other Governments of the Continent earlier in the year. At present the various Governments concerned are awaiting the submission of expert proposals by the protection committee, and it is believed that action on a wide scale will be taken upon receipt of the committee's report.

No serious fear exists respecting the safety of the birds during their actual breeding seasons, for the game laws of the countries concerned afford that a degree of protection which, if it does not altogether satisfy the ornithologists, at least exposes the game to no immediate danger of extermination. But the game laws of no single country are able to afford them protection during their migrating periods, and the result is that under present conditions they are exposed to continual slaughter all the way from Sweden to Egypt and back again. The numbers of them which breed in the north are steadily decreasing, a fact which the Swedish Government is in a peculiarly favorable position for noting, hence the proposals which it has submitted to the other Governments of the Continent.

Compared to the processes of their commercialization, such as refrigerator cars and cold storage warehouses, the actual methods of slaughtering the birds are minor enemies, and it is believed that one of the main problems in protecting them is that of enlisting the sympathy and cooperation of the wholesale game dealers. This, however, is a problem which the protection committee is likely to consider at its meeting this Winter. The Swedish Government has confined itself in the proposals that it has submitted to the other Governments to suggested restrictions upon the times and methods of slaughter. One of the most costly of these is the toll that it exacts from migrating ducks in the use of sunken nets, by which large numbers of diving ducks are taken in the Baltic. It is probable that the committee will recommend that the use of these nets be entirely prohibited. Another method to which the Swedish Government has called attention is the use of duck decoys, by which large numbers of birds are lured into traps. This is a very old method of hunting and is now used almost exclusively in the Baltic countries. The bulk of the supply for the game markets of Europe is now taken by this method, and the committee is expected to recommend that its use be prohibited during the Spring migration.

Most of these suggested restrictions are to be framed for Continental countries, most of which are very far behind Britain in the protection they afford to game birds. Due principally to its often criticised land régime, Britain is regarded on the Continent as a vast and richly populated bird reservation, and the threat of extermination which hangs over the wild ducks of the Continent does not exist in the British Isles. BUTTERFLY TABLES POPULAR least in their more primitive varieties—have long had a place.

These fabrics, almost all Kerman weaves, embrace large rugs patterned all over with a multitude of full length figures portraying personages famous in history. Smaller sized rugs are found with single figures. Another type, of an older and more primitive design, shows the daily activities of the nomad tribes which make these pictorial fabrics in Southern Persia. Such rugs are better suited for floor coverings than the portrait rugs, which are more appropriate for hangings.

The introduction of the Chinese rugs, with their figures of dragons and Buddhist symbols of animals and household objects, has no doubt prepared the Occidental world for the Kerman rugs with their realistic designs. Figures of animals have always been found on certain types of Persian rugs, among which are the well-known hunting rugs where, in wondrous soft colors, leopards attack bullocks and jackals bring down fawns.

The Persian has always held a more liberal view regarding the representation of animals or human figures than the more orthodox Mohammedan weavers of the Turkish or Caucasian rug. And the wandering tribes that inhabit the mountainous district of which the city of Kerman is the centre are more liberal in that respect than the inhabitants of any other part of Persia.

Pictorial Persian Rugs

In the pictorial Persian rug the connoisseur has the choice of the rug which, in its technique, approaches the detail and realism of European tapestries—as, for example, the rugs covered with a multitude of historic figures—or he may have the more primitive and in many ways the more decorative weaves on which the figures are represented in a naïve manner and with a flat, decorative effect of design. Characteristic of this latter variety are the rugs that picture in a delightful way much of the daily life of those nomad tribes which, in their isolated mountain valleys, live a patriarchal life that was old 2,000 years ago.

The simpler types of rugs have generally a tan background of the undyed wool on which in dark brownish-reds, dull orange, blues which are sometimes almost black, and tawny yellows the homely activities of the tribe are presented. Here is the chief of the clan under his tent surrounded by his head men. Scenes of hunting are shown and homely tasks are pictured, such as the grinding of meal, the sewing of clothes by the women and the plowing and harvesting. A narrow, winding band of light blue that suggests the outline of a medallion in the centre of the rug represents a valley stream flowing by the camp. On the border of the rug is woven an orderly procession of bullocks drawing farm sleds, horses harnessed to carts, men and women in festive garb and in workaday attire—all woven in a highly decorative manner.

The other type of pictorial rug, of which there seems to be more variation in size, is no doubt closely allied to the pictorial cotton prints which in India commemorated historical events. In their general effect these rugs often suggest the crowded surfaces of Gothic tapestry. They are more useful as hangings than floor coverings, for the reality of the drawing prohibits one from putting a foot on a carefully modeled face or the body of a historical character.

One rug of this type seen recently was more than nine by thirteen feet in size and carried on its surface a bewildering multitude of famous characters in history. With remarkable thoughtfulness the maker had provided alongside of each character a small number which was repeated in the border, where, in picturesque Arabic lettering, appeared the name of the personage. More than one hundred and sixty figures had been patiently woven into the surface of the rug, with the centre medallion carrying the portraits of the leaders of world religions, famous rulers, great statesmen, philosophers and soldiers. Christ, Moses and Confucius head the pageant of the great, with Tamerlane and Louis XIV, Charlemagne and Washington, Christopher Columbus and Peter the Great—all forming a picturesque assemblage. On the rest of the field of the rug, outside of the centre medallion, is a host of Persian notables from the early kings of the Persians to the lately deposed Shah.

Smaller sized rugs in this pictorial mode show a single figure sitting among foliage by the side of a garden pool. With the naïveté of the East, one may see the fish swimming in the water, while on the surface float dignified swans. These garden motives are frequent in Persian rugs, although they are generally found without human figures. Conventionalized flower forms and rectangular spaces representing garden walks are the favorite means by which the Persian rug weaver symbolizes the garden. In the hot, dry lands of the East it is little wonder that the native rug maker sought to bring into his art the delight of his people in shaded gardens, green with trees and refreshing with flowers.

Other Kerman rugs are inspired by architectural motifs. One may have on a rug a picture of the outside as well as a view of the inside of some famous mosque. Madonnas are favorite subjects also, and in the method of expression suggest early Byzantine art. In the choice of Persian pictorial rugs one has to use his good taste, for, as in any type of rug, there are good designs and poor ones. Some of the modern ones have departed too far from the decorative traditions of the past, no doubt, but many others, both modern and antique, show workmanship with a fine instinct for the limitations as well as the possibilities of the weaver's art.

IRELAND SETTLES DOWN

FRESH proof that Ireland is settling down comes from one of the inland counties, where, it is observed, the ballad singer has almost entirely disappeared from market and fair. Not so long ago—as recently, at any rate, as the Home Rule period—singers of ballads roaming in the streets of towns and villages and wherever men were gathered played an important part in the life of the never tranquil island. Their lyric observations on questions of current importance are described as having had a decided influence on the molding of public opinion.

WAR'S EFFECT ON ART

CHANGE wrought by the war found evidence in the work of the late Robert Bevan, an exhibition of whose artistic production was recently held in London. Bevan studied in Paris, and his earlier pictures dealt chiefly with light and atmosphere. After the war, his output developed simplicity of style, with accurate presentation of animal life and town and country scenes, even the now almost extinct London cab horse exciting his keen sense of humorous artistry.

EUROPE NOW HAS AUTOPHOBIA

Malady Affects Those Who Object to the Speed, Traffic Dangers and Noises.

WHEN the other day in London Miss Ethel Strudwick told the Public Safety Congress that she was an entirely unregenerate pedestrian, that she intended to remain a pedestrian until she was killed and that she was perfectly certain that she "and probably most others in this room" would be killed by motor cars, further proof was produced to substantiate a recent French writer's assertion that the modern world is suffering from a malady known as autophobia.

While it is true that the world and his wife, if asked to give up motor cars, would indignantly refuse—or would, more probably, laugh in derision—the automobile has enemies whose voices seem not to be decreasing in volume. For this declaration of hostilities against those who look upon petrol as the greatest blessing of the twentieth century speed maniacs are no doubt chiefly responsible. Speed, traffic dangers, pollution of the air and noises are listed by the opposition as cardinal sins against society.

Whether those suffering from autophobia would like to see the world slip quietly back to those peaceful days when the streets and country roads were infested with nothing deadlier than horses and bicycles is a question such sufferers can best answer for themselves. But that the pendulum of minority opinion has swung some distance becomes increasingly apparent.

Miss Strudwick, it may be felt by some, put the case rather forcefully when she told the Public Safety Congress: "Forty million pounds' worth of orders for new automobiles have already been placed; that means that £40,000,000 more danger will be released on the roads." But the speaker was prepared to go further than that in her eloquent wrath, for she added: "Motorists should go all over the country in underground tunnels for which they paid themselves and in which they will only kill each other."

Favored Bicycles

In England, at the moment, the anti-motor war seems to be raging with special virulence. In some cases it is openly belligerent, as in the instance just noted. In other cases it takes the form, rather, of defense of the bicycle as a vehicle of locomotion—the bicycle having recently been objected to by advocates of gasoline power. An English enthusiast writes:

"Cycling has continued to grow steadily in favor, despite much opposition and repeated reports that it was 'dead,' until today its popularity must be obvious to any frequenter of the open road. The pastime has an old and honorable tradition, cherished at the present time by clubs whose membership runs into hundreds of thousands."

This Englishman makes a distinction between "genuine cyclists" and "bicycle-hack users." Cyclists in England, he observes, "are numerous enough to demand that certain old fallacies be now realized to be such. The bicycle is not 'humble.' It is not 'the poor man's carriage.' It is not 'dead.' It is not a 'push-bike.' It is not 'obsolete.' It is the chosen instrument of recreation and exercise of vast numbers of sensible citizens. These people are not 'a nuisance on the road'—to any but arrogant autocrats. They are not 'road-scum.' And I believe that in no European country but England are they ever regarded as such."

The allusion to "arrogant autocrats" was called forth by the fact that motorists in England have been of late making a special effort to clear the roads for motoring. In this connection the recent agitation for the removal of Banbury Cross comes incidentally to mind. But, defenders of the bicycle insist, "the pedal is holding its own against petrol"; and "the cyclist is not going to be hustled off the road or tempted by the far greater distances offered by the motor-bicycle at a very moderate cost."

Naturally the motorcycle is classed with the automobile by those who have contracted the malady of autophobia. Many consider it the greater of two evils. In fact, some people who are not at all opposed to the motor car are sworn enemies of the motorcycle. The Manchester Guardian said editorially the other day:

"We should all like to see the motor-bicycle altered in the direction of peaceful progress; invention will only be paying reparations to a ravaged world if it schools this cyclone of fury into some anti-cyclonic quietude. Man gained little when the bone-shaker was replaced by the nerve-shatterer, and the motorcycle in one of the weapons of injustice, since it is not the owner's nerves which suffer most from the explosive resources of his toy."

On the other hand, The Manchester Guardian, speaking more generally, points out that the motorist has helped if he has also harassed the cyclist. "His hobby and his money have brought to the bicycle a better system of roads, with smoother surfaces."

Noisy Motor Boats

Meanwhile, the motor boat, too, is being attacked. For some time controversy has proceeded, more or less heatedly, over motor-boating on Lake Windermere. It is contended that this beautiful English lake is in danger of losing the characteristics that make it distinctive, because fleets of motor boats plow across its otherwise tranquil surface. The inundation seems to have begun about three years ago, and last year the Windermere Motor Boat Club was founded.

"There are now ten or fifteen motor boats regularly about the lake," says a resident of Windermere. "They are of varying power; all are of the racing type. Some, from the point of view of the public peace, are unobjectionable, but the tendency is for the newer boats to be of the very noisy sort. Silencers are supposed to be used; but the rule is treated with derision, and the peace not only of the lake but also of the adjoining countryside is disturbed by the most nerve-wracking noises."

A spirited response comes from a member of the Royal Aero Club, London. It would seem, he writes, that "no one owning a motor boat has a right even to look at Windermere as a source of pleasure. Surely the statement that people would leave the district as a protest is a little far-fetched. These outbursts remind one of the early days of motoring and aviation, when gallons of ink were wasted by bigoted individuals. But the sport went on, and later the commercial side developed to benefit mankind. So with the internal combustion engine as adapted to vessels. Sportsmen who race these boats contribute their mite to progress in design and manufacture."

As regards autophobia in its larger phase, a French writer says, in L'Illustration, that farmers, who at first raised their voices against the motor car came in time to see that it was, after all, a convenience. Slowly they began availing themselves of this convenience, until it can no longer be said that autophobia is worst in the rural districts. Is there a cure for the malady? The French writer thinks so. "Autophobia among city-bred people," he observes, "is not more incurable than that among country people. The only remedy to be administered to a man who detests the automobile is to procure him the means of obtaining one for himself." In other words, autophobia is found to be a result of suppressed desire. Give every man a car of his own (or a motorcycle or a motor boat) and "autophobia will quickly become no more than a memory." Read the Romantic Story of these
FLORIDA SEA BEANS

WHEN the recent Florida hurricane swept up from the Indies, furiously lashing the Caribbean Sea to its very depths, quantities of these strange crimson tropical Sea Beans, torn from their native West Indian isle, were cast up on Florida sands.

For generations these Sea Beans have been hunted and treasured by the Seminoles Indians, who attribute a curious magic to them. For this reason they have been difficult to secure heretofore. Now, however, our long-standing friendship with the Seminoles, and the unusual numbers of Sea Beans washed ashore, put us in possession of a limited supply.

Ebony-striped, of crimson color, hard as stone, they are susceptible to a high polish which makes bright gems of them. Linked together with 14-karat reinforced gold, they form a handsome and unique bracelet. Price $3.50 (by registered mail $3.75). May be had at George Bell Company's jewelry store, 4 East 42nd Street, New York, or at the studio of

WATCH YOUR THROAT!

The warning signal

MORE serious illnesses than you can count on the fingers of both hands start with the warning signal, an irritated throat.

A tickle in your throat is nature's way of saying "Look out—Danger ahead: the bacteria are getting the upper hand!" Naturally, too, because the throat is the open door for infection. It is the ideal breeding place for disease germs.

And in spite of this, so many of us neglect throat protection! A good, healthy body will be able to throw off the attacks of many bacteria, but very often the human system is not in the proper condition to fight them back.

When you think of your throat in this way, it seems amazing that more people do not take the proper precaution against illnesses that start with throat infection. Particularly, when the safe antiseptic, Listerine, is as near at hand as any corner drug store.

Be on the safe side these winter days. Use Listerine regularly as a mouth wash and gargle. Also, then, you will be on the polite side with regard to that insidious condition, halitosis (unpleasant breath).—Lambert Pharmacal Company, St. Louis, U. S. A.

This stunningly beautiful toiletware is the ideal Christmas gift

THE woman who receives a toilet set of Fiberloid on Christmas morning may well be proud of her gift—it will be the admiration and envy of all her friends—both as a gift, and later, when it adds its Parisian grace to her toilet-table.

Whether you choose important nine-piece sets of the rich new Gloria design or simple three-piece sets of Deauville, or some one of the other popular Fiberloid patterns, you may be sure that a warm welcome awaits Fiberloid Giftware. For all Fiberloid Toiletware is Paris-smart in design and color, as well as perfect in workmanship and finish. Women whose discernment leads them to select the best choose it instinctively.

You will find these newest Fiberloid creations in the more select stores. If your favorite store does not have them, we will very gladly tell you where they can be seen. The Fiberloid Corporation, Indian Orchard, Mass.

A FRIENDLY CLOCK

The Gift Sponsored by Noted Interior Decorators

HERE is a gift you can choose with the assurance that it is today considered a vital part of the decorating scheme of every room.

For interior decorators so highly regard a clock's friendly air of cheeriness and life that they put one in nearly every room they plan—living-room, dining-room, hall, bedroom, kitchen or nursery.

Their choice rests on Seth Thomas because these clocks are so beautifully designed and made with such masterly craftsmanship.

And each clock has the wonderful accuracy these clocks have been famous for since the first Seth Thomas was made 113 years ago.

Moreover, they're moderately priced—from $6 to $120. No other gift for such an expenditure can equal their qualities of enduring beauty and decorative value.

Ask your dealer to show you his Seth Thomas Clocks before you make up your Christmas list. You will find them a wonderful solution for many of your most difficult gift problems.

Amazing Progress in Permanent Waving

The Circuline Process is free from any injurious ingredients such as potash — or ammonia, (a chemical injurious to the hair texture, and easily recognized by its odor). Circuline is gentle and absolutely safe.

ONE of these Ten Circulines Contains YOUR Perfect Permanent Wave!

SINCE Mr. Charles Nessler (C. Nestle) invented permanent waving in 1905, he has devoted his energies to the solution of what he believed to be the most important problem—how to treat each head of hair according to its individual requirements. He knew that one inflexible process of permanent waving, no matter how perfect on some heads, must be imperfect on others.

Now he announces the solution of that problem in the invention of the Text-o-meter—an ingenious machine that places all hair into one of ten classes, and prescribes the correct Circuline for each class.

The PERFECT Wave —neither too little nor too much!

This means that whether your hair be fine or coarse, bleached or dyed, regardless of its structure, the Text-o-meter will determine its exact classification, and prescribe which Circuline is the correct one for your hair.

This process of definitely classifying hair, of treating it according to its individual character, once and for all takes the risk out of permanent waving. It assures every woman a soft, naturally flowing wave.

And above all—SAFETY Always!

So gentle is Circuline, so suited to all classes of hair that your hair may be re-waved just as often as the new growth requires. Just as with naturally wavy hair, dampness and frequent shampooing only enhance the beauty of a Circuline Wave.

And what is more, once you know the correct Circuline number for your hair—as you know the correct size of gloves or shoes you wear—you may obtain a perfect Circuline Wave at a Circuline Shop anywhere in the world—always assured of success!

Our interesting booklet describing NESTLE CIRCULINE will be sent you without charge.

THE NESTLE TEXT-O-METER CLASSIFIES YOUR HAIR

The Nestle Text-o-meter tells your hairdresser within a few minutes to which of ten classes your hair belongs—exactly which Circuline to use in waving it.

Only those hairdressers who have been graduated from a special course in the use of the Text-o-meter in the Nestle Institute of Hair Science are licensed to use it.

If your hairdresser is not a licensed Text-o-meter hairdresser, then send a small hair sample to the Nestle laboratories at 12 East 49th Street, enclosing $1.00 for hair test and classification. Or if you can call personally at either of the two Nestle Establishments listed below, a free test will be made while you wait.

Re-wave—without waving over!

¶ By now, last summer's permanents have been partly displaced by the growth of new and unwaved hair. . . . . New permanent waves are necessary. . . . . new permanent waves of the new hair alone!

¶ For it is unnecessary to rewave the already waved portion . . . if you go to a Eugène Waver.

¶ The Eugène Method is unique in its ability to do this Selective Waving of the new growth only—due to the precise control made possible by the exclusive Eugène Two-Sectional Steamers and the Eugèneol Re-wave Sachets. . . . . .

¶ Let us send you a list of accredited Eugène Wavers near you, and a copy of our interesting booklet "The Eugène Method." It tells why the gentle Eugène way of waving with clean white steam produces the natural wide undulations so much in demand—and why the slightly higher price of the Eugène Method is far outweighed by its saving of the hair.

Keep this Christmas in Ciné-Kodak Movies

FROM Tad up, movies the Kodak way furnish fun for everyone. First, the movies you make yourself—starting with the sports and pleasures of Christmas day. Then the screen classics—dramas, comedies, travelogues, animated cartoons (just wait, by the way, till Tad first sets his popping eyes on the antics of Felix)—all rented reasonably from a Kodascope Library for a private showing in your home.

There's pleasure complete—movies you make yourself of whoever and whatever interest you. Regular movie theatre releases that you show yourself in your own home.

Eastman equipment that makes this all possible includes the Ciné-Kodak, which makes movies as easily as any Brownie makes snapshots; and Kodascope, which projects them and is just as simple to work.

There's nothing you'd like better for Christmas—and you may be sure that almost anyone on your gift list feels the same way.

The Ciné-Kodak Model B, with Kodak Anastigmat f.6.5 lens, is priced at $70; with Kodak Anastigmat f.3.5, at an even hundred. The Kodascope C projector is $60.

A complete outfit now—Ciné-Kodak, Kodascope, and Screen—as low as $140

The thousands of Kodak dealers are now prepared to demonstrate the Ciné-Kodak. If your dealer is not yet ready, write us for Ciné-Kodak booklets.

Parcels A and B, approximately 250 acres—located on Harrison St. and Purchase St., town of Harrison, adjoining the Progress and Century Country Clubs and the Straus Estate. Several brooks are on the property which can be used for water hazards.

Parcel C approximately 120 acres—located on the old Greenwich Road, near King St. and Rye Lake—the old Griffin farm and adjoining the estate of Miss Ina Claire. All high land with a beautiful scenic view.

Parcel D, approximately 150 acres, located on Whippoorwill Road, town of Northcastle—the old Eckardt farm. Has more than one mile of road frontage with a most beautiful view over Kensico Reservoir.

Parcels E and F, approximately 260 acres at Valhalla, located on the Upper Cross Road, running through to Kensico Road, which connects directly with the Bronx Parkway, about 5 miles from the city of White Plains. All high land with a beautiful unobstructed view overlooking the Kensico Reservoir.

Advertising Department,
The New York Times,
Times Square, New York.

Gentlemen:

Enclosed please find our check for $9,232.10 on the Farmers Loan & Trust Co., in payment for this advertisement. The purpose of this advertisement is to notify all persons or organizations owning tracts of land in Westchester County which are suitable for golf courses, that we are in a position to buy, sell, exchange or develop these tracts into 18, 27 or 36 hole golf courses.

Any golf club in Westchester that is considering changing its location may have a complete course of 18, 27 or 36 holes constructed for them on property controlled by our company. Any necessary financial adjustment covering values of property exchanged, bought or sold can be made.

We intend to develop Tracts A and B indicated on this map with the first semi-public sports and country club in Westchester County. It will include two complete 18-hole courses, and about 9 miles of woodland bridle path. Ideally situated and adjacent to the Century Country Club and the Progress Country Club and having excellent transportation facilities by train and motor via Bronx River Parkway (where motorists may travel at 35 miles an hour) the success of this project is assured.

Any one desiring further information regarding this enterprise may address Mr. Gilman P. Tiffany, 1 Wall Street, New York City.

Very truly yours,

BRONXVILLE GOLF ASSOCIATION, INC.

New York.

Gentlemen:—

Am heartily in accord with your idea of building golf courses in the wide open spaces of beautiful Westchester, where a club may have 18, 27 or 36-holes, so that they will not be cramped and surrounded by business properties and thickly populated sections, where players may have plenty of room to play, rest and enjoy the scenery. This is where golf should be played to obtain the most beneficial results.

Your very truly,

Willie MacFarlane

Gentlemen:—

Your organization has some very fine properties in Westchester County, located as they are in a beautiful country equal for golf to that of my own—Scotland.

The acreage adjoining the Progress and Century Clubs is ideal for a semi-public golf course, large enough for two complete 18-hole courses and as fine as any in the county. It is easily accessible.

In the completion of these courses you are bound to enjoy immediate success.

Sincerely yours,

Tom Winton

My Dear Mr. Winburn:—

It is very gratifying to me to receive your instructions as representing your company to proceed with the survey and engineering work on the thousand or more acres owned by your organization, which are in parcels of approximately 125 to 250 acres, in different choice localities in the county, adjacent to some of the best golf courses in Westchester. I shall prepare plans so that Mr. Tom Winton, with the assistance of Mr. Willie MacFarlane's advice and suggestions, can complete as rapidly as possible the building of these courses.

Very truly yours,

Gentlemen —

Your proposition from a golfer's viewpoint is very practical and will meet a great demand in Westchester County.

Therefore it gives me great pleasure to accept your offer to act as [redacted] of your chain of semi-public golf courses in Westchester County.

Have already started to enroll membership for the Purchase courses.

This will acknowledge receipt of your check on account of contract.

Yours very truly,

Gentlemen:—

Westchester County is the playground of the Metropolis. It has more outdoor recreational clubs than any other county in America. With its healthful and scenic attractions and accessibility to New York, Westchester want. There should be a semi-public club there, and your venture in this is an ideal location for a semi-public golf club and fulfills a long-needed respect is bound to succeed. One of the most prominent society women, upon her return from a trip around the world, made this statement to newspaper men: "The most interesting place in the world is Westchester County." I agree with her.

Underthings of "Celanese" Brand Fabrics

Registered U. S. Patent Office

Soft, luxurious feminine undies fashioned of the favourite new fabrics—Celanese Brand—a modern discovery that is at once amazingly practical and irresistibly lovely. Celanese fabrics are scarcely affected by temperature variations, and may be worn with comfort during the cold days of Winter as well as during the milder months of Spring and Summer.

Celanese may be tubbed again and again and will retain its loveliness until it is discarded. It will outwear other fabrics because of the special characteristics of its yarn. An ideal gift indeed, for the beauty of these Celanese undergarments will capture the feminine fancy and their serviceability will appeal to feminine logic.

Fanette—Dance set of ombre Celanese voile in green, tangerine, Chanel red or purple. Step-in drawers and bandeau $8.90

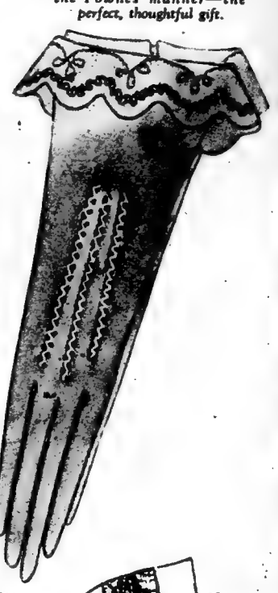
FOWNES Gloves

Christmas glove of Fownes fine suede, with a scalloped cuff embroidered in contrasting shade. Beautifully designed, beautifully finished in the Fownes manner—the perfect, thoughtful gift.



THESE gloves . . . made by the same firm since 1777 . . . worn in the genteel days of old New York . . . respected today among people of fashion . . . have the perfect quality for Christmas giving. From Fownes, you can choose a really beautiful glove. It will be made of the finest leather—processed into a quality of exquisite lightness and suppleness. It will have slendered fingers, fine lines, a delicate finish to complement the lovely hands of the wearer. There will be pleasing little details like handsome embroidery, hand-stitching, new trimmings. And because people everywhere know about Fownes and its fine, famous quality, the glove marked "Fownes" receives its special Christmas welcome always. On sale at your favorite shop. Fownes Brothers & Co., Inc., 354 Fourth Avenue, New York.

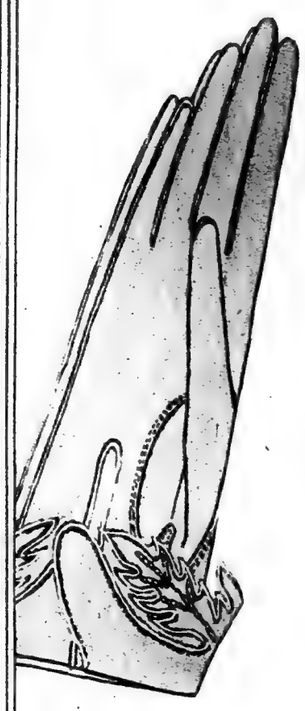
1777

A new design by Fownes—not a slip-on, but with a new style wrist that does away with fasteners, and yet because of a narrow cut around the wrist fits snugly and does away with the crumply appearance most slip-on gloves give. In suede or kid, with a motif of cross-stitch, petit-point or embroidery to decorate the sleeve when turned back.

1926



An interesting late winter style from Fownes, charmingly designed with a cut-out leaf motif, as illustrated. In black with white and light gray embroidery; in gray with lighter gray and pearl; and a new rosewood, self-embroidered in darker and lighter shades. A charming glove for a gift.

STEINWAY

THE INSTRUMENT OF THE IMMORTALS

Fritz Kreisler uses the Steinway exclusively

People of moderate means buy the majority of STEINWAY PIANOS

It is true that practically every musician of note during the past 70 years has chosen the Steinway for use and ownership. And it is equally true that the Steinway has been selected to grace the music-rooms of thousands of great town and country houses, here and abroad.

But Henry Steinway, who built the first Steinway piano, was a musician. And all the members of the present Steinway family are musicians. In fact, four generations of the Steinway family have been schooled in the art of music, and trained to regard their business from the viewpoint of a musician. Consequently, the Steinway is kept, now as always, well within the reach of students, amateurs, and men and women of limited incomes. To these people, Steinway pianos are sold in ever-increasing numbers each year. The price is always as low as possible as a matter of principle. The terms are remarkably convenient. There are many styles and sizes to choose from. Any one of them will prove the true economy that lies in buying the best, for any one of them will return 20, 30, or even 40 years of perfect service.

A new Steinway piano can be bought from

$875 up

Any Steinway piano may be purchased with a cash deposit of 10%, and the balance will be extended over a period of two years

USED PIANOS ACCEPTED IN PARTIAL EXCHANGE

Disregard, if you will, the frank praise of Paderewski, Rachmaninoff, Hofmann, Levitzki and hundreds of others. Consider the Steinway on the simple basis of economy, if you prefer. And you will quickly convince yourself, by provable facts, that anyone who can afford a piano can afford a Steinway.

NEW YORK'S 100 NEEDIEST CASES

FIFTEENTH ANNUAL APPEAL

"CAST ME NOT OFF IN THE TIME OF OLD AGE."

This Picture Is Given by Neysa McMein as Her Contribution to The Hundred Neediest Cases.

A RECORD EACH YEAR FOR NEEDIEST FUND

This is the fifteenth annual appeal for the Hundred Neediest Cases. Fourteen times before, when Christmas came near, the call has gone out and readers of The New York Times have heard. Their generous, whole-hearted responses have been shining chapters in the history of giving.

Each year the amount contributed has grown. Starting at $3,630.88 in 1912, the Hundred Neediest Fund has increased annually until in 1925 it reached the high total of $260,998.26.

Since the first appeal was made, more than 2,600 cases—10,500 individuals—have been helped. Last year, 11,340 persons contributed enough to relieve 345 cases—or 245 in addition to the first hundred neediest. Each case received, on the average, $756.

If the contributions for the 1926 fund exceed those of 1925, at least 1,500 individuals will find relief and, in many instances, life itself.

The report of the receipts, up to date, of the Hundred Neediest Cases Fund will be found on Page 1 of the Editorial Section.

CONTRIBUTIONS to the Hundred Neediest Cases must come in great number if the good achieved last year is to be equaled. Since the first appeal in 1913 there has been an increase each year in the amount given, and surely this precedent should not be broken this year.

The appeal is made each year at Christmas time, but the gifts mean Christmas cheer—and far more. They work their good throughout the year. Relief for the Neediest is not a temporary benefit, but provides for stricken families during the entire period of their distress. Contributions are not used for the purchase of toys or luxuries, but for the necessities of life. For the hundred are those which, above all others in the city, are in want.

There is no solicitation of contributions for the Neediest Cases. The only appeal is in the publication of their stories in these pages. Gifts come from readers whose hearts are touched. Such responses bring about two inestimable benefits. They give succor to people who, through no fault of their own, have come to misfortune. And they also provide the means for fulfilling the exhilarating impulse of a spontaneous and voluntary act of good-will.

Contributions should not be postponed. To delay and then forget is to hear the cry of a stricken family and then leave it to its fate. To withhold a contribution that could be sent is like passing by, unheeding, an unfortunate fellow-being.

What Gifts Will Do.

Gifts to the Neediest will buy food and return color to the cheeks of undernourished children. They will save homes for penniless widows whose children are in danger of being taken from them and placed in institutions. They will buy clothes for ragged, underclad boys and girls. They will help invalid breadwinners to recover health. They will bring comfort to aged people at the end of their means, and they will make last days easier for hopeless sufferers.

The Hundred Neediest Cases and the additional ones which will be relieved are selected from lists furnished by six great philanthropic agencies. There is not one case of mendicancy among them. Every family has been the victim of great and unavoidable adversity.

Some cases are marked by the stubborn courage with which mothers have fought to support their families. The appeal for charity has not been made by the mother until her own and her children's lives have become endangered by exposure and undernourishment. In a majority of instances, the first appeal came from neighbors, school teachers, hospital nurses and others who discovered the extreme distress of the family.

Families which now seem completely wrecked will be made self-supporting within a comparatively short time through the aid which contributions to the Neediest make possible. Medical attention will enable many a sick father or mother to recover health. An operation in one case, a long rest in another, and expert treatment in others will bring back health and strength to breadwinners.

To accomplish all this, small contributions are sought as well as large ones. Gifts of savings that have been sent by children have rescued many broken families in past years. The fund has been swelled by widows' mites as well as by the contributions of philanthropists. More than 1,000 contributions were made last year in memory of dear ones.

Checks should be made out to the "Hundred Neediest Cases Fund." Contributions may be sent to The New York Times, Times Square, New York City, or to any of these six charity organizations which administer the fund:

The New York Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor
105 East Twenty-second Street.

The Charity Organization Society
105 East Twenty-second Street.

The State Charities Aid Association
105 East Twenty-second Street

The Brooklyn Bureau of Charities

WHAT GIVING MEANS, IN WORDS OF THOSE WHO GIVE

IN letters that accompany checks for The Hundred Neediest Cases is written a gospel of giving. What follows are a few expressions from last week's contributors. They come from young and old, from rich and poor. Some come from New York City; others from places far distant. Each in its way voices the spirit of true charity.

Edwin M. Hydeman—To give or not to give? Is that the question? To alleviate suffering is a divine command. To rehabilitate the unfortunate is a divine privilege.

Anonymous—It gives me much pleasure each year to send you my bit toward the Neediest Cases. The boy in whose memory it is given shed so much sunshine in his short life. I would like to pass it along "In Memory of Gordon."

Robert H. Mainzer—It is bitter cold and snowing hard, and your appeal for the Hundred Neediest Cases strikes a responsive chord in my heart. On a day like this, Case No. 10, with the widow and her three children living in the abandoned stable, seems especially sad. I wish to take care of this case in its entirety, and as the excellent Brooklyn Bureau of Charities is asking for $250 to aid this deserving widow, I take great pleasure in enclosing my check to your order for this amount. It is a privilege to be allowed to help in this worthy endeavor.

Henry Meckauer—Once again you make your appeal for the Hundred Neediest Cases, a service worthy of your best efforts. There should be no doubt of its success. It should always succeed, because it is honest, intelligent, humane and constructive charity. I enclose check for $100 which please apply to the general fund. The pleasure I derive therefrom is more than ample.

S. Winston Childs—I enclose my check for $25 to my annual contribution to this worthy cause, counting myself lucky to be able to help. I should be very glad if you would apply this money to the aid of any one suffering from infantile paralysis. After my recovery from that disease nine years ago, I feel somehow a closer bond of sympathy for those unfortunate sufferers.

A. P. L., Kingston, N. Y.—I could not enjoy my own Christmas if I had not sent my mite to you for this beautiful work. How I wish I could multiply my necessarily small check many times. My blessing goes with it, trusting it may inspire others who can only give a little, to "go and do likewise."

* * *

H. F. B.—I am enclosing my check for $1,000 for this wonderful charity and hope you will be successful in raising the desired amount. It makes my Christmas happier to know that I am allowed and able to help some one in need and thus bring to them a ray of sunshine.

* * *

Margaret Reed, Hasbrouck Heights, N. J.—I cannot seem to get out of my thoughts the picture of the little girl and the gaunt dog "whose eyes also have a heart-breaking look and who regards the child with profound attention." So my contribution to this wonderful Christmas cause goes to Case 22.

Anonymous—Enclosed please find a check for $10, which we would like to donate to Case 1. This contribution is from Billy, who is very happy, and hopes that Davy may become so. Billy is also 6.

* * *

Mrs. Irene M. Smillie—Please apply this on Case 23 to help the child crippled by infantile paralysis. It is but a tiny expression of gratitude for one of my own who miraculously escaped a similar fate.

EVERY DOLLAR GIVEN GOES TO THE NEEDIEST

Every cent collected for the Hundred Neediest Cases Fund goes to those in want; there is no deduction of any kind, for office or administrative work, no expense incurred in disbursing the money. Every dollar goes for food, clothing, medical aid and rent.

These cases are, indeed, the first call on charity. Of all those in want in the city, their need is the most urgent. Thus, to give to the Neediest is to give where it counts most.

No personal solicitation for funds is authorized. The only appeal made is in the publication of the stories themselves. Contributions are voluntary offerings and the appeal is for small gifts as well as large.

Checks should be made payable to the "Hundred Neediest Cases Fund." Contributions may be sent to The New York Times, Times Square, New York City, or to any of the six organizations, listed on this page, that present the cases.

Contributions are exempt, under the law, from the Federal and State income taxes.

The following are those of the Hundred Neediest Cases which have thus far been overlooked by contributors, either in whole or in part. Like the others for whom aid has come, they are in sore need of help. Unless it is given, and given without delay, the tragedy which hangs over them will descend upon them.

CASE 31.

A Mother Is Defeated in Her Struggle to Keep Her Afflicted Son.

She was getting old. For twenty years she had scrubbed floors, but a little more than a year ago the corporation discharged her—gave her a year's extra pay. Because of her age she has been unable to obtain other work. A friend, a telephone girl in the great building where she had scrubbed, visited her recently and found her in dire want. The year's extra pay had been exhausted, for the aged woman has not only herself to keep, but also her middle-aged son Danny. Danny has never been quite right, although his mother will not admit it. Danny is harmless and pleasant, but his mind slips. His mother has always cared for him and loved him more than if he had been a mental giant. Now it is proposed to send Danny to a State hospital and his mother to a home for the aged, but they are despairing at the thought of being separated. It is hoped to keep them together a little while longer.

CASE 61.

Sleeping Sickness Grips the Father of Eight Needy Children.

A painter receiving good wages succeeded not only in providing for his wife and eight children, but also in buying a home, subject to mortgage. Three years ago that dread disease, sleeping sickness, attacked him. Everything they had, even much of their furniture, has gone to keep the family and to provide medical attention for the father. He is still alive, but his condition is hopeless. His wife takes boarders and works out during the day as a chambermaid, besides doing heavy housework at home. But what she earns goes a very little way toward the care of her husband and the children, Vera, 14; Bert, 13; Ralph, 12; Jack, 10; Kate, 7; Jennie, 6, and the twins, Mollie and Frank, 4. Her burden must be lightened so that she can keep on.

CASE 9.

Grandparents and an Orphan Granddaughter in Want Through Illness.

Three lines written shakily on a piece of wrapping paper asked help for "my grandchild." At the address given an aged woman was found tending her granddaughter, Elsie, 15, ill of pneumonia. On the mantel a candle burned before St. Joseph, protector of orphans. In another room an old man lay crippled from rheumatism. The old couple had reared the grandchild since their daughter's death. The grandfather had a cellar coal and wood business, but illness had forced him to give it up. Elsie had left school, but had hardly started to work when she came down with pneumonia. It will be months before she can return to work.

CASE 17.

A Young Mother and Her Seven Fatherless Boys.

Jimmie is called "Charlie Chaplin" because of the fit of his clothes. Nearly everything he wears belonged to his father, who died a year ago. Jimmie, at 13, is a little fellow and his father was a big longshoreman. No amount of cutting and remodeling could make the clothes look otherwise than grotesque; still the boy must wear them, because they are the only garments he has. He has learned to pretend to ignore the ridicule they bring him. Jimmie's widowed mother takes in laundry and thus earns a few dollars a week. Jimmie, who is in grade 7B, delivers newspapers every day. But the two cannot support the family, for Jimmie has six younger brothers: Arnold, 12, in 6A; Arthur, 11, in 6B; Burt, 10, in 5A; Charles, 8, in 4A;

His Father in Prison, This Boy Faces the World Alone.

Albert thought the world of his father—they were almost chums. For some years they had lived together in the Canadian wilderness. Then, four years ago, they came to New York and Albert went to school. Although he is 15 years old he is only in the fifth grade. On his return from school he would cook dinner for his father, and afterward they would go to the movies or sit at home and talk. Albert did not know that his father was crack-brained and dangerous. One night the man did not come home. In revenge for a supposed wrong he set fire to a building; he was caught and taken to jail. His first thought was for his son. The police promised to look after Albert. Next morning a worker from the Children's Court found a tearful boy whose world had come to an end. The father, already 60, was sent to prison for many years. The boy, with light hair and clear blue eyes, has a pleasing personality. His knowledge of outdoor life makes him an authority on natural history among the children with whom he is thrown. Help is asked so that he may have training and a fair chance in life.

CASE 11.

A Family of Nine, the Victims of Many Misfortunes.

Louis, 10, was knocked down by an automobile and carried to a hospital. Three days later he was taken home by a hospital social worker. She found other members of the family in greater need of help than Louis. His father, a shoemaker, trying to earn extra money for his large family, had worked by the hour in a lumber yard. A huge timber thrown from a truck struck him and crushed his face. Operation after operation was necessary, and his nervous system was deeply affected. The savings were ebbing and his wife was in great anxiety. Suddenly, in her own kitchen, she was badly hurt. The heavy ceiling fell on her, inflicting serious injuries. She was still in bed when the automobile accident happened to Louis. Moses, 15, will be at work in another year. There are five other children. Today there is no wage earner in this family of nine. Help will mean life and hope to them.

CASE 13.

A Widow and Her Seven Helpless Children—Stranded.

When Thomas Wood, a laborer, died of pneumonia, there was an undertaking bill of $400 for his widow and seven children to pay and the insurance was only $150. Bruce, 16, the oldest boy, left school and found employment paying $14 a week. The mother went to work at home finishing coats. Betty, 10, a beautiful child with great brown eyes, tried to help by pulling out bastings, but she bent too close over her work and jabbed a steel instrument in her eye. A doctor promised to save the child's sight, but insisted on having $100 in cash. The frantic woman borrowed it. Then it was found necessary, after all, to remove the injured eye. The child now needs an artificial eye, but the poor mother is deep in debt and the small amount that she and Bruce can earn will not even hold the family together. Pleading to stay at home, three of the boys—Harvey, 13; James, 8, and Thomas 6—were taken away and placed in an institution. Help is asked to reunite the family and see it through its afflictions.

CASE 5.

In the Fatherless Home of Six, an Invalid Girl Keeps House.

Rachel, seventeen, had tuberculosis, but after her father's death she took care of the home and of the five younger children. Her mother was at the market at the work of plucking chickens. She earned $10 a week and they lived in four small, dark, rear rooms by a stable. They all were underfed and Rachel's health was rapidly becoming worse when neighbors asked the welfare organization for help. She was sent away for a time, and is now at home, the tuberculosis arrested. She works part time as a bookkeeper. Joseph, 16, is earning $16 a week as a jeweler's apprentice. In time the family will be self-supporting, but they must have assistance to live through the coming year.

CASE 65.

A Crippled Father and His Helpless Family of Five.

Frederick was born three months ago in a bare room in the basement of an old frame tenement. There was little preparation for his coming. His father was in the hospital and his brothers and sisters were half-starved and in rags. Clothing was provided for the baby by members of a nearby church. Frederick's father was a skilled workman, a polisher of ornamental brasses. One day he made a false movement, and an emery wheel cut deep into his arm. It severed a nerve and left the arm half paralyzed. He received $200 in compensation, but was never able to return to his trade. He became a plasterer's helper. A falling scaffold struck his back. He recovered, but both injuries developed after effects. A cancer on the arm resulted from one, tuberculosis of the spine from the other. His arm was amputated. His back is in a plaster cast. The mother, in the time she has remaining after looking after her family, earns about $3 a week finishing coats. Louis, the oldest boy, is 14, but is only in the fifth grade, having been held back by physical handicaps. In spite of his lack of education he will soon go to work to help support the family. Ruth is 8, and Thelma is 3. Ruth is in the first grade and is self-conscious about her worn and ill-fitting clothes. Frederick, in spite of the environment that he was born into, is a promising baby. The family cannot go on without help.

CASE 85.

The Father Gone, a Mother and Four Children Facing Starvation.

The mother and four children sleep in one bed, the only one they have. A fifth child is expected soon. The rent is two months overdue and the landlord has threatened to dispossess them. Mother and children are undernourished and frightened. The oldest is Fred, 8, who is in 2B. Jack is 6, and Tom is 3. Mary, 2, is a cripple from infantile paralysis and walks with difficulty, dragging a heavy iron brace. They were well treated by their father until, recently, he lost his mind and disappeared. The mother must find a helping hand.

Four Are Left Fatherless and a Mother Cannot Earn Enough for Them.

Arthur was born in June—three months after his father had been buried. Very little was left after the funeral expenses were paid. Arthur was one of four who were left fatherless, the others being George, 8, Harold, 6, and Josephine, 4. Grief-stricken and bewildered, their mother, who was only 29, found a job as a janitress and took outside work when she could. She made over cast-off garments to clothe her children, and she keeps the little folk remarkably neat. Although only 8, George is in 4A. A school nurse noticed the undernourished condition of the two older children. A visit to the home showed that the young mother was breaking under her heavy burdens and that the suffering of the family was becoming acute.

Pneumonia Takes the Father and a Mother and Four Are Penniless.

Leo's school report from Class 8A read "Not alert or active, rather listless, but very dependable." His face was wan and he never played or smiled. The reason became known when a neighbor asked for help for the family. The father had died of pneumonia, leaving a widow and four children without money. Leo had not been having enough to eat. He had been getting up before dawn to deliver breakfast rolls for a baker. His mother is too frail and sickly to do any outside work after caring for her four boys. The three others are Walter, 8; Arthur, 6, and Al, 4. The family must be helped.

CASE 35.

A Father in Jail, a Mother and Five Children Who Hunger.

"I am in very bad need," she wrote. Her husband had just been sent to prison. Her heart was so weak that she could do only very light work. Her five children were hungry. She had told her plight to the Judge who sentenced her husband. He told her to go to the charitable society, but she borrowed a stamp and wrote a letter because she did not have the money for carfare. The visitor found the woman shrinking and timid. Since her husband's arrest every knock at the door had made her jump. She and her children were stunned by the disgrace that had befallen them, for they had always thought their father the best of men. The oldest boy, John, 13, is in Junior High. Jennie is in 7A, and Joseph in 6A. The others are Ellen, 8, and Mary, 4. The three schoolchildren had left home that morning without breakfast. Little Ellen and Mary that day had had only sweet cakes that a neighbor gave them for lunch. Their eyes shone and they ate eagerly when food was provided. The father, a mechanic, has an indeterminate sentence for receiving stolen goods. They all believe that he yielded to the temptation only because much sickness had left them without savings.

An Aunt Forgotten by the Two Motherless Boys She Reared.

Mary sent a large part of her wages to her sister every month to help her with her two boys. When the sister died, Mary moved down from Connecticut, where she worked, to New York and took the boys. She found employment here and was able to earn enough to support them. She raised them to manhood. They went to work. For a while all three lived comfortably. One morning the nephews did not appear at the usual time. The aunt found their beds had not been slept in. She discovered a note from the boys, telling her that they were tired of New York and were going out to see the world. She has not heard of them since. Crippled from rheumatism, her eyes dimmed with age, she could no longer support herself. An old friend took her in. The friend has become ill and they are at the end of their resources. The two aged women hope that they will be able to continue to enjoy each other's companionship, but outside help must make it possible.

The Father Killed in an Accident, the Mother and Two in Want.

Ethel, 11, still wakes up screaming at night from the memory of the time her father was brought home dead. He was killed and terribly mutilated by a train on his way home from work. No one saw the accident, and there was no basis for a claim for compensation. A mother and two children were left penniless. Visitors found the home a good one for children to be reared in. It had a devoted and capable mother, who cooks, washes, irons, cleans and sews for her children and sits up until after midnight working on ribbon ornaments. But she earns less than $5 a week. She must have help if the children are to remain with her.

CASE 58.

Aged and Crippled, He Strains to Support a Feebler One.

A nurse at a clinic who was treating a man of 64 for arthritis found him to be suffering more from lack of nourishment than from the disease. At her request a visitor went to his home. She found him living with an aunt who was 80, blind in one eye and very feeble. For several days they had had nothing to eat except soup made from a ham bone which a neighbor had given them. He had earned his living as a carpenter until arthritis crippled his hands. A kind-hearted man, he had taken care of his old aunt for thirty years. His work had long been intermittent because of his illness. Recently it had stopped altogether, and they were literally starving when their plight was discovered. He is able to earn a little money at present cutting out tiny wooden elephants, lions and giraffes for Noah's arks. He earns $8.85 a week when the arthritis will let him, but that is hardly a third of what they require to keep alive and to keep together.

CASE 91.

With Their Father in Prison, Eight Are Left in Distress.

Frederick is in an ungraded class. He is 15 but has a mentality of 8. He is so tall, thin and white and has such flaming red hair that they call him "Candles" at school. Because he is so backward it will be years before he has the education required by law and can go to work. His father is in prison and may be removed to an insane asylum. At home are his mother and his six younger brothers and sisters. There are only two beds in the house. The mother and four sisters sleep in one, lying crosswise. The three boys sleep in the folding bed in the kitchen, which is closed in the daytime to serve as a shelf. The kitchen is the mother's workshop; there she sews on coats which she hauls to and from the factory in a baby carriage. She earns $8 a week. They are without food, clothes, furniture and necessities of every kind.

This Girl of 15 Is the Only Wage Earner in a Family of Seven.

Catherine, 15, is the only wage-earner. She works in a lace factory and earns $12 a week, but this does not go far when there are seven mouths to be fed. The father, who had always been a hard-working man, is a hopeless invalid at the age of 38. A stroke left him with a paralyzed left side and a crippled heart. The other children are Julia, 14; Beatrice, 11; Angelina, 4, and John, 9. Catherine cannot win her battle without help.

The Father Is Paralyzed; the Anemic Mother Cannot Earn for Five.

Julian, a trustworthy and affectionate boy of 14, in 8A, will be able to go to work in a year to help support his mother, his brothers, Christopher, 10, and Lawrence, 6. At present they are destitute. They have too little to eat and their clothing has been patched over and over again. The mother, anemic and suffering from heart trouble, still goes out to work when she can, laundering and cleaning, but cannot earn an average of more than $13 a month. The father suffered a stroke of paralysis along with an injury received at work. The compensation of $440 which he collected more than a year ago is exhausted and he is a hopeless paralytic. Help is necessary until Julian can take up the load.

CASE 53.

Overwork and Illness Break Down the Father of Six.

School teachers took heed when the Hart children lost their color and grew pinched and pathetic. The family was found to be in the last extreme of poverty. Everything salable had been sold. Five children were sleeping in one bed. It was cold, and there were enough blankets only when they were packed together this way. The sixth child, Jack, a year old, sleeps in his carriage. The mother, besides caring for her six children and her invalid husband, was working as a janitress in the house, and her wages of $2.50 a week was their only income. The father had undermined his health in his struggle to support his large family. He had held three jobs at once—counterman in a restaurant from six in the morning to noon, waiter in another from noon to six, and dishwasher in a third thence until eleven at night. He almost died of pneumonia and is now recovering slowly. The five who had to share the same blankets are Joe, 12, who is in 7B; Helen, 10, in 6B; Peter, 9, in 4A; Bruce, 6, in 2A; and Jennie, 4. They must be tided over.

Want May Separate This Mother and Her 8-Year-Old Daughter.

Mrs. Calder and her 8-year-old daughter, Virginia, live in a single room furnished with only a bed and a chair. They are allowed to cook on the kitchen stove of a family downstairs. Mrs. Calder has a weak heart. She supports herself and Virginia by fashioning tassels, lamp shades and silk flowers at home. They go to bed early to save light, and they eat almost nothing. The mother's heart condition makes it steadily more difficult for her to work at all. It has been suggested that she may have to give up Virginia, who is her only comfort and all that she lives for. "I can't give her up," says the mother. "I will work harder." But unless outside help comes the two must part.

CASE 34.

Six Good Children, Fatherless, Hungry, Frightened.

A school teacher noticed how thin and haggard one of her pupils was. At her request a visitor went to the home and found a weeping mother and six hungry and frightened children. The little money left on the death of the father had been exhausted. The mother had taken up tailoring at home, but, with six children to look after, she could earn only $5 a week. Their poverty had come on them suddenly. They had been well provided for until one day—the fourth day after last Christmas—their father, who had seemed in good health, died of cerebral hemorrhage. He left a family of exceptionally good children—Marion, 15; Billy, 13; Nancy, 12; Harry, 10; Gus, 8, and Grace, 6. Just before her father's death, Nancy, a handsome child with bright dark eyes and dimples, was the winner in her school popularity contest. It is seldom that there is a mark below B+ on any of their report cards. Marion is hurriedly learning dressmaking. But it will be eight months before she can go to work. Meanwhile the family has no resources.

A Boy Ill, and Another Injured, in a Fatherless Home of Five.

Billy, 12 years old, has been ailing since last Spring. Recently it was found that he was suffering from heart disease as a sequel to measles. Special diet and tonic have been prescribed for him, but his mother does not know where the money is coming from to pay for it. They cannot meet their ordinary expenses now. The father died of cancer two years ago. Joe, then 15, went to work in a paper factory. One of his fingers was caught in a machine. The finger had to be amputated and this experience at the beginning of his career as a breadwinner has greatly discouraged the boy. His mother is crippled with rheumatism. The other children are Charlie, 14, and Danny, 4.

A Neglected Child of 3 Who Cannot Walk or Talk.

Jane, going on 3 years, cannot walk or talk yet. She moaned almost constantly for months. She is improving a little now and has strength enough to sit in a chair and rock from side to side. Physicians do not understand her condition, but know that it comes from past neglect and malnutrition. Her mother died when she was born. Her father became crippled by infantile paralysis. Her grandmother, a very aged woman, did her best, but she could not give the sickly child proper attention. Jane should have nourishing food, sunshine and constant care.

WHY EVERY CENT GOES TO THE NEEDIEST

Every cent contributed to the Neediest Cases goes, wisely supervised, to the beneficiaries; there are no deductions for cost of collecting or of administering the fund. These functions ordinarily cost many thousands of dollars. The New York Times, which bears the whole cost of the collection, has full compensation in the knowledge that it is doing a public service, and the six organizations that so ably and painstakingly administer the fund are fully compensated for their services by the benefits which they, as well as all philanthropic organizations, indirectly receive in arousing interest in their work by the widespread publicity given to these tragedies of this great, busy and prosperous city.

HOW TO CONTRIBUTE TO THE NEEDIEST

Checks should be made payable to THE ONE HUNDRED NEEDIEST CASES FUND and mailed to
THE NEW YORK TIMES, TIMES SQUARE, NEW YORK or to any one of the six charity organizations from whose lists these cases are selected.

GROWTH OF THE FUND

The growth of the response to the appeal for the Neediest Cases from year to year is shown as follows:

PRE-CHRISTMAS IN THE THEATRES—A LIGHT WEEK

Those "Pirates." Being the Rollicking and Not Unlyric Chorus Men in Mr. Ames's Production of "The Pirates of Penzance," at the Plymouth.

ACCORDING TO MR. MAUGHAM

Constancy as a Matter of Convenience—Delights and Ethics of His Tight and Airless Little World—A Word on Gilbertians and "The Pirates of Penzance"

By J. BROOKS ATKINSON.

ALTHOUGH in "The Constant Wife" Mr. Maugham may not be leading us out of the wilderness into the green Promised Land with the sobriety of a good prophet, we have to thank him for a gayly wicked evening in the theatre. His delightful play comes off, as they say, on his own cynical terms. His depravity is in the very best of taste. As nearly every one has noted, Mr. Maugham's treatment of infidelity as a mildly deplorable but not necessarily fatal aberration—as a mere peccadillo—expresses the same worldly point of view as Mr. Coward's "This Was a Man." In both plays the respective husbands and wives refuse to raise the customary din over their humiliation; being reasonable, well bred and modishly bored, they keep their emotions under control. (Ah, this loose cosmopolitanism!) If Mr. Coward's play seems tawdry on the whole, the reason is that he has directed our attention to the fact itself and the languid people, with a helpless, disdainful air of "now it must be told." Mr. Maugham long ago abandoned the mourner's bench; his interest is in the delightful absurdity of the idea. Two of his characters, Martha Culver and Mortimer Durham, represent the superannuated Victorian point of view in their quaint show of indignation over John Middleton's illicit amour. "How vulgar!" Mr. Maugham implies. And so he neatly manoeuvres them into a secondary position where their choler and disgust over a moral principle become frantic wing-beats in the void. Never for a moment are the sympathies of the audience uncertain. Like all the characters in the play, we are amused in a superior way at this latter-day exhibition of moral bad temper. In Mr. Maugham's sophisticated plays all show of natural emotion is outside the pale—a symbol of common breeding. Even though we are immoral, let us at least keep our self-respect. Let us be civilized. One of Mr. Coward's people says: "Marriage is an overrated amusement." More than that, it is largely an illusion, as the conveniences of annulment by the proper authorities now and then suggest.

AVOIDING a natural impulse to be inspirational or illuminating on the topic of conjugal relations, Mr. Maugham keeps all his major characters on a dead level of good humor and insouciance. By giving them large incomes, by freeing them from the ordinary irritations of making a living and, in particular, by dismissing the perennial problem of the child as a trifle, with a flick of the manicured hand, he likewise reduces infidelity to the innocuous level of teatable gossip, of white lies and cocktails in a dry era. Unless you are temperamentally censorious you will not object to his characters. Mrs. Culver, mother of the sinned-against and sinning wife, is disillusioned and practical; women are supposed to be faithful, she says, but any one knows that men are adventuresome. Barbara Fawcett, a widow now wedded to a career, has the candid wisdom of the liberated sex. Bernard Kershal, the romantic bachelor who has loved in vain for fifteen years, reveals the mansuetude, the practical ethics and the sense of decency of a properly dressed citizen. We may count on him to the bitter end—even for a chivalrous indiscretion. Mrs. Middleton, the offended wife, may tolerate her husband's moral prankishness, and may ultimately take a lover herself for six weeks in Italy, but a thousand niceties of thought and deed indicate the virtue of her character. She solves the conflict of marital principles pleasantly enough by earning her living. Earn your board and do as you like. Life is as simple as that in the Maugham precincts. With the two sly malefactors, Marie Louise Durham and John Middleton, F. R. C. S., a decent rotter, we feel, of course, less pleased—for they are stupid enough to be caught. Clumsiness is unforgivable. By letting them think of themselves as inordinately sly and crafty for nearly two acts, Mr. Maugham makes it perfectly clear that their chief sin is stupidity. "Frankness is often a pose to conceal one's real thoughts," says Mrs. Culver in the first epigrammatic moments of the play. Yet in Mr. Maugham's tight and airless little world, frankness is a necessity; indeed, one must be frank, even with one's self—frank to the point of disparagement. One may deceive one's friends if that is convenient; but one must not deceive one's self. Dear friends, that is elementary Maugham ethics.

Like the characters of his play, Mr. Maugham does not rely upon genius or inspiration to tell his story; he puts all his trust in skill, and we are continuously amused, not only by the wit of the dialogue and the dry point of view, but by the ingenious construction of the comedy. In the first act Marie-Louise asks John Middleton, who is not only lover but surgeon, to step into his office and examine her knee. "What's the matter with her knee?" says Martha eagerly. Mrs. Middleton replies: "It slips." Though you may not believe it from reading them here, these economical lines are a huge joke in the theatre. Laughter greets them with a merry shout. But why? Well, merely because Mr. Maugham has been leading up to them step by step by the most subtle kind of craftsmanship until "it slips" plainly refers to Marie-Louise's moral resistance. Between Miss Barrymore, as John's forbearing wife, and the audience a cordial understanding has been firmly established. We know that she knows what the hullabaloo is all about; and that the joke is not on her but on the prurient busybodies who have come to witness her shame. The "slipping knee" is a broad lampoon on the entire situation.

MR. MAUGHAM has the greatest fun with this wise Mrs. Middleton, whose wayward husband amuses her while he offends all her acquaintances. Miss Barrymore swims through the part buoyantly, and shares the author's obvious enjoyment. Something about the mocking gleam in her eyes on her first appearance tells the secret plainly, although she does not breathe a word of what she knows. To make the sport all the more amusing Mr. Maugham confronts her with her pitying mother and her scandalized sister, and then, quite suddenly, with her dissembling friend, Marie-Louise, whose sense of fairness is earnest but frail. In the manner of light comedy, to which she was born, Miss Barrymore bites her lip to restrain a laugh and closes her eyes languorously to hide the ghost of a smile. For the space of one evening the ritual of acting technique is by mutual consent suspended and Miss Barrymore opens her bag of tricks, looking very beautiful into the bargain.

Making the most of his situation, Mr. Maugham snickers a little on all sides; he plays off Miss Barrymore's fluffy good nature against the heaviness of her sycophant husband and traitoress, and matches it with the frank admiration of a pre-nuptial suitor. When the suspense has been destroyed in the second act by the passionate, tense scene with Marie-Louise's suspicious husband, some of the gayety slips out of the play. But Mr. Maugham plays another tune on the same thread in Act III. Here Mrs. Middleton tells her dumfounded husband that she is going to Italy with Bernard Kershal. Kershal, who drops in casually soon after (for Mr. Maugham arranges exits and entrances to suit his convenience), does not realize that John Middleton has been told. Being a man of Maugham honor, he understands that under no circumstance must the husband find out. Clumsiness, it has been said, is unforgivable. With the air of a man quite satisfied with his cleverness, Kershal then begins to throw John Middleton off the scent. "So you are going to Italy," he says to Mrs. Middleton innocently. For several risible moments Mr. Maugham plays with this final situation to the complete enjoyment of the audience. Although Miss Barrymore is clearly the most glamourous player in the company, all the other parts are acted pleasantly in their proper spirit; and the direction makes the most of the fun.

Mr. Maugham is an arid playwright. His dramas are seldom moistened by hot tears; their laughter is hard, their texture brittle. His world is flat; no depths or heights relieve its dead surface. But his wit is quite as sharp as his skill and "The Constant Wife" is a gay, tickling comedy. We must thank him for a pleasantly wicked evening.

Gilbertians and Non-Gilbertians.

WITH appetites whetted by a superb revival of "Iolanthe," the audience at the première of "The Pirates of Penzance" was noticeably giddy even before the overture began. Mr. Ames had only to raise the curtain and let his erudite spectators carry his production along; they knew every word and every note; none of the new "business" was lost on them. It was not a sane audience; it was an audience of Gilbertians.

What is a Gilbertian? It is easier to describe a non-Gilbertian first. For a non-Gilbertian is a man of taste and discrimination, responsive to the elegancies of comedy and singing, a man with a nicely balanced sense of humor and a love of beauty, who holds as self-evident the fact that Gilbert and Sullivan produced the best light operas of all time. A non-Gilbertian is not grudging of praise. He believes the Savoy operas to be perfect, and the combination of Gilbert's mocking comedy and Sullivan's entrancing score to be a true marriage of the purest genius. "Here is truth," he says in the manner of the pirates and the charming young ladies, "and here is food for joyous laughter."

Amid such universal superlatives, what is left for the Gilbertians? Ah, that is "something else again." The Gilbertian believes all these things to the point of mania. As the audience at the première showed, the Gilbertian is a preternatural concept—not a man at all, but a phantom of passions and illusions whose eyes glitter and whose movements remain unaccountable to the amenities of social etiquette. He laughs two minutes before the keyword, he bursts into wild storms of applause and shouts "bravo" with unnatural zeal; he loosens the screws in his chair with wild lunges, and in the very ecstasy of madness he beats his neighbors on either side and signals to his kinsmen in all parts of the theatre. He speaks names and dates glibly, a transfixed stare in his eyes; his memory runs back more than forty years, and he will even pretend that he attended the very first performances. You can trust him with all your worldly goods. But walk softly through the sacred paths of the Savoy comedies. Be careful what you say; be circumspect in your thought.

If the madness ran fast and loose on the opening night, it was because Mr. Ames's "The Pirates of Penzance" was a brilliant performance. It caught the niceties of the Gilbert text, the superb idioms of the lyrics, and it was never self-conscious. "The Pirates" boasts much of the loveliest and many of the most comic themes in the Sullivan scores. They are played and sung to the Queen's own taste. If Mr. Barclay, as the Pirate King, is the most delightful of the singers, Mr. Williams as Frederic is hardly inferior. Miss Thomas as Mabel is exactly right. Miss Rose as Ruth, a piratical maid-of-all-work, is perfect. Whoa! Leave the rest to Gilbertians.

THE WEEK'S EVENTS

MOSCOW THEATRE HABIMA—Tomorrow night at the Mansfield Theatre. The first American appearance of a troupe which first came together in Russia in 1905, and which has since acted here and there throughout Europe. Their opening play, to be continued through the week, is "The Dybbuk." The performances are in Hebrew.

HOWDY KING—Tomorrow night at the Morosco Theatre. A play about an Arizona rancher in a small European kingdom, with Minor Watson as the rancher. Mark Swan wrote it and Anne Nichols is the producer.

HANGMAN'S HOUSE—Thursday night at the Forrest Theatre. A dramatization, by Willard Mack, of Donn Byrne's novel of the same name. The players will include Katherine Alexander, Walter Abel, Katherine Emmet, Frank Shannon, Percy Waram and Joseph Kilgour.

THE DYBBUK—Thursday night at the Neighborhood Playhouse. A revival, after a year, of a production which drew all the town to Grand Street.

L'ADVENTURIERE—Thursday night at the Cosmopolitan Theatre. Cecile Sorel's only new offering of the week. Her full schedule will be as follows: "Le Misanthrope" for the first half of the week, "L'Adventuriere" on Thursday, "Maitresse de Roi" Friday and Saturday nights, "La Dame aux Camelias" on Saturday afternoon.

PARIS LETTER

PARIS, Dec. 1.

IN spite of its title, there is nothing Miltonic about "Le Paradis Perdu," the new play at the Théâtre des Mathurins. The authors, Lucien Daudet (Léon Daudet's brother) and Edouard Ferras, a young actor who has already been seen on the stage of the Odéon, obviously lack experience; yet, with all its shortcomings, this first play of theirs, exceedingly talkative though it is, is by no means uninteresting. The subject—the unhappy life of a loving woman deserted and regretted by her deserter—has, as the authors frankly acknowledge, been borrowed from Balzac's short story, "La Femme Abandonnée," the heroine, Catherine de Rânes, a truly Balzacian "femme de trente ans," having been forsaken by the man for whom she divorced her husband. This revival of Balzac's influence in recent plays (the youths in Lucien Descaves's "Le Coeur Ebloui" talk admiringly of Mme. de Mortsauf, the heroine of "Le Lys dan la Vallée") is as interesting as it is unexpected.

Living in her secluded château somewhere in Touraine, Catherine wins the love of a romantic young neighbor, Comte Antoine de Leudes. In the second act, the first half of which is full of the conventional phraseology found, for instance, in the nonsensical comedies of Raymond Roussel, we see the couple in a Nice hotel after the usual trip to Italy. The young Don Juan, who is, of course, playing the 'cello, finds his liaison with Catherine burdensome and yields to his mother, who wants him to marry a wealthy tennis champion. The lovers separate. In a Pinero-cum-Dumas fils dénouement, Antoine talks of suicide, leaves his home, tries to renew relations with Catherine, is sent away, but—unlike Gaston de Nueil in Balzac's novelette—does not shoot himself. It is not clear whether Catherine will die of heart failure, or in the long run forgive Antoine. The play is chiefly valuable as an almost Proustian satire on the mannerisms and

WHAT NEWS ON THE RIALTO?

Light Holiday Prospects, but the Usual Pre-Holiday Decline—"The Pirates" a Success—Mr. Ziegfeld's Theatre and Its Premiere—Miss Wood Out of "The Nightingale"

AS matters stand at the moment the holiday influx of new plays will be not so great as might be imagined. The week of the 20th will bring forth the new Sidney Howard play, "The Silver Cord," at the John Golden (it will subsequently alternate weekly with "Ned McCobb's Daughter"); Miss Le Gallienne and her company in "Twelfth Night"; Miss Lillie in "Oh, Please!" at the Fulton (on Tuesday the 21st), and Mr. Skinner's revival of "The Honor of the Family," on Christmas night, which will be Saturday, at the Booth. Then, some time over the week end, the musical show called "Peggy Ann" will be revealed at the Vanderbilt, probably on Saturday night. The Guitrys and "Mozart" will open at the Forty-sixth Street on Monday the 27th; on the same night "Wooden Kimono" will be seen at the Martin Beck. Mr. Sothern and "What Never Dies" are mentioned for the 26th, although with no great certainty. Mr. Ziegfeld's production of "Betsy" will be seen at the New Amsterdam on that night, and, by way of contrast, something called "In Abraham's Bosom" will be offered at the Provincetown. . . . The list will doubtless be increased.

Trade was poor during the past week—the beginning, of course, of the annual pre-holiday slump. One of the major musical hits was said to have been nearly $1,000 under normal on Monday night.

"The Pirates of Penzance," rightly given an impetus by Mr. Ames's production of "Iolanthe," began with a bang at the Plymouth. There were standees on the second night. . . . Speaking of trade, Chicago is apparently giving real support to Frances Starr and "The Shelf," which were turned down abruptly by this town.

And, if box-office returns may be made the subject of an additional paragraph, the chances are that the opening performance at the new Ziegfeld Theatre will bring in some $62,000. At all events, the house has been so scaled, even before the opening attraction has been selected. As for that opening attraction, it seems to lie between "Rio Rita" and "Show Boat."

Elsie Janis, although nothing much is being said about it, is spending a year in "concert," after the manner of Will Rogers. She wound up a tour last night in St. Joseph, Mo., and after taking a rest she will begin another on Jan. 3.

"The Nightingale," which has Jenny Lind for its heroine, is scheduled to be the next attraction at Jolson's, opening on or about Jan. 8. Peggy Wood is withdrawing from the cast, to be succeeded by Eleanor Painter. Tom Wise is also joining the company.

Earl Carroll, also, is promising a new revue for Jan. 3, although the impression was abroad that the current entertainment was doing a prosperous trade. The new one—or partly new one, as the case may be—will include a large part of Mr. Charlot's most recent English revue, to say nothing of many of Mr. Charlot's players.

Jan. 3, or thereabouts, is likewise the date set for the première of Miss Eagels in "Chicago," certain to be a gala occasion. It will take place at the Music Box. Miss Bordoni's representation of "Mozart" will be on view for but another week at that house, thus giving it two weeks of idleness. And, since one of these weeks includes New Year's Eve, Mr. Harris is probably not rejoicing.

Part of the news from England is that "The Last of Mrs. Cheyney," which has been keeping two of London's best-known actors occupied for more than a year, has but another week to run. Gerald Du Maurier, thus freed, will turn to a new play entitled "Interference," at the same time returning to the dual rôle of actor-manager. "Interference," say the London newspapers, has been bought for America by Gilbert Miller. It is "a psychological study with a strong family interest," whatever that means, and the authors are Roland Pertwee and some one named Dr. Harold Dearden. . . . As for Gladys Cooper, likewise liberated by the closing of Mr. Lonsdale's play, she will take a rest for three months and then act in "The Letter," by Somerset Maugham. "The Letter" has been frequently mentioned for production on this side, generally by Robert Milton.

Further news from London is that they are so fond of "Aloma of the South Seas" over there that they are about to revive it, although it closed only a few months ago. They call it merely "Aloma." And London's two standard revivals, "Peter Pan" and "Charley's Aunt," are also about to be launched.

"Sunny" left the New Amsterdam last night with various records hanging to its belt. It goes to Philadelphia and Boston, and by that time it will be a new season. . . . Other departures last night included "The Woman Disputed," a fair-to-middling success, and "Up the Line," a failure.

Still another departing production was "The Blonde Sinner," which has had a long and rather mysterious existence, chiefly at the Frolic Theatre. Then, too, "The Witch" was withdrawn from the Greenwich Village, and "Slaves All" closed at the Bijou after a week's performance. "Beyond the Horizon" will be moved to the Bijou from the Mansfield tomorrow night.

A farce called "Where's Your Husband?"—there's no stopping these playwrights—opened on Thursday night in Wilmington, and is presumably a metropolitan possibility. Four more new pieces will open out of town during the week to come. "Peggy Ann"—they are calling it just "Peggy" during the try-out, but assurances are given that it will be known as "Peggy Ann" in New York—will have its first performance in Philadelphia tomorrow night; "The Lace Petticoat," an operetta, will have its première in Newark, and "Sam Abramovitch" will be seen for the first time in Washington. On Thursday night Pauline Lord will open in Stamford in "Daisies Won't Tell."

Madge Kennedy and Sidney Blackmer are about to embark on a southern tour of eight weeks—and that is worthy of comment, since fewer and fewer of the stars are venturing south in recent seasons. When the tour is over the same two are likely to appear in "Andrew Takes a Wife," although there is a chance that they will go to London to act "Love-in-a-Mist."

The Sam Bernard show will probably be called "That's My Baby." It is supposed to open in Brooklyn in another week, and, as generally happens with big musical shows, it may be ready and it may not.

A play entitled "People Don't Do Such Things" is about to be put into rehearsal by the Messrs. Jones & Green. . . . "Mayfair," said to be a josh on the Coward and Arlen dramas, will open in Newark a week hence. It goes to Philadelphia for two weeks before coming to New York. . . . "The Donovan Affair" will close at the Fulton this week, resuming in Brooklyn after a week's idleness. . . . "Ballyhoo," a play of carnival life by J. K. Nicholson, will probably open at Werba's Brooklyn Theatre on Jan. 3.

The Theatre Guild plans to put the repertory system, or a modification of it, into effect at both its theatres. At the John Golden, beginning a week hence, "The Silver Cord" and "Ned McCobb's Daughter" will alternate, each playing a week. And at the Guild Theatre, beginning some time in January, "Pygmalion" will likewise share the stage with "The Brothers Karamazov." A majority of showmen, of course, believe that the run of a successful play cannot be thus abandoned and resumed without some damage to the play's popularity. The Guild's experiment, however, will provide a quick answer, one way or the other.

The show called "Sweet Lady," which opened in Detroit last week, turns out to be nothing less than a musical version of "Papa Loves Mama." . . . "Miss Happiness," a musical piece hopefully a-tour, closed last night in Washington. . . . "In This Room," recently seen in Chicago, likewise closed on tour last night. After some revisions it will open here in January.

"Yours Truly," which has Leon Errol as star, will probably come to town about Jan. 24. It will visit Detroit and Pittsburgh in the interim.

"Few Can Do It," by Arthur Caesar, will probably have John Halliday and Lucile Watson in its cast. It is said to be in rehearsal.

FURTHER NEWS OF THE THEATRE, HERE AND OVERSEAS

LO! THE POOR PRODUCER

Difficulties and Heartbreaks of Modern Musical Comedy Production

The material for the following article was secured from Philip Goodman, producer of "The Ramblers," and his associates in that musical comedy.

THERE are tinsel, glamour and adventure in the theatre, but they are not for the musical comedy producer. To him the theatre is just a business where the gamble is far greater than in any other business. To protect this gamble, therefore, he must be a tireless worker, often giving up months of his time before his show even gets to the rehearsal stage. So keen is competition in the theatre in the way of lavishness, music, comedy and talent that the manager, with an eye to safeguarding his investment, begins laying his plans sometimes as far as a whole year ahead. Thus many musical comedy stars now appearing in Broadway productions have already been signed up for engagements in pieces which will not be on display before next September or October. With some talent thus assured, the producer engages book writers, lyricists and composers and informs them who will be in the cast so they can incorporate business suitable to the particular talents of those persons. Then the authors are supposed to set to work, with the plenitude of time a distinct advantage.

The first phase of the undertaking is not yet complete. There is the question of scenic investiture, costumes, novelties and lighting. The producer sets to work busying designers and costumers. Models must be approved, color effects passed on and lighting ideas discussed. The matter of booking, too, is an all-important one. In spite of the seventy-odd theatres in New York, only a handful or so can accommodate a big musical show. It becomes necessary, therefore, to obtain a suitable playhouse as far as six months in advance. The signing of a theatre is naturally expedited by the preponderance of first-rank players and stars in the cast. Since theatres operate on a guarantee-plus-a-percentage basis, owners lease their houses not only to the reliable and successful producer but also to the one whose cast on paper seems most likely to attract big trade when the production eventually reaches town. This does not imply that attractions are not booked in hurriedly. They are. But the man who spends upward of $100,000 on a production cannot afford to risk his investment on chance bookings. Many a big show in the past, because of incompleted booking arrangements, has been forced to continue touring the hinterlands long after its tryout weeks, and, as all who know the theatre can testify, this is usually far from financially productive.

The time between completing bookings, passing on scenery and costume designs and engaging minor principals and the chorus is spent by the producer in listening to the librettist, composer and lyric writer tell their newest "gags" and play their song numbers. Terror begins to enter his soul about a month before the call for rehearsals is set. He complains that his writers have not yet unearthed a sure fire song hit for him. The tunes are all right, yes, but they haven't the lilt of a tremendously popular success. And the situations in the book are hackneyed and humorless. Something must be done and done quickly. The collaborators exit worrying and return the next day with new songs and new scenes. This continues until the piece goes into rehearsal.

Rehearsals, as most everybody knows, are hectic affairs. They start off leisurely enough, but as the time of the premiere draws near the activity becomes almost maddening. A glance into the average rehearsal hall offers an interesting sidelight on how a musical show is assembled. The company is divided into two groups. The principals form a small division unto themselves and hide away in some obscure room, where the director of the dialogue—very often the author himself—reads the script. The chorus girls and men, of course, form the larger group, and they are gathered around a piano in a spacious rehearsal hall, where the composer plays the various numbers in the show, while the lyricist sings or talks the words. They are supplied with mimeographed copies of the lyrics and are expected to memorize them as speedily as possible. The real work for the entire company commences a day or two later, when the principals, having in part mastered their lines, begin enacting their rôles as best they can. The chorus girls don practice clothes, whereupon the director of the musical numbers immediately assumes the rôle of king.

The impresario, meanwhile, is not inactive. He watches the leads rehearse and then dashes into the big room to see the chorus work. He never stops making suggestions, and long after the actors have gone he holds conferences with his staff and the authors. In the meantime, costumes are being rushed through, the scenery is being readied and the props are checked off as they are purchased. A nervous tenseness seizes the company as the day for the dress rehearsal approaches. There is no more leisure. Everything is speed. Hours mean nothing, and night and day they toil, tired, leg weary, hoarse. Some who began the long rehearsal grind are no longer with the troupe. For one reason or another they have either dropped out themselves or have been dismissed. Replacements are easily fitted into the general scheme of things, such as it is, and the rehearsals go on apace. The time has arrived for a merging of the two groups—the principals, who have been rehearsing by themselves, and the chorus. The amalgamation process is no sooner completed than the dress rehearsal is held.

Pages can be written outlining the tribulations and worries that beset the producer at this particular time. His carpenter reports the scenery doesn't seem to be ready. The electrician comes in with a similar portion of "grief." The wardrobe woman is almost hysterical because costumes and slippers are missing. Several parts of the orchestration have yet to be received. The back drop doesn't hang properly because it isn't long enough, and so on. Time is precious. Orders are hurriedly given and somehow or other—the whole thing is really inexplicable—almost every item appears out of nowhere just when things look darkest. The curtain is finally rung up and the producer qualifies as one of the ten gloomiest people in America. Nothing seems funny; the music sounds terrible; the dance numbers lack variety and pep; the scenery refuses to work; the lights fail to blend.

Whatever drastic cuts are decided upon after the dress rehearsal are made, wherever possible, in time for the première performance, which is usually staged in a theatre far away from New York. The usual tryout or break-in period runs, as a general rule, from two to three weeks unless the producer feels more time is necessary to get the piece set. In this event he may keep it out of New York several weeks longer or change his plans in their entirety by booking his attraction into Chicago for a run.

No matter what the change in plans, the conferences continue heatedly between producer and authors. Whole scenes may be—and often are—thrown out bodily and others introduced. Dance and song numbers may be—and often are—eliminated to make way for new specialties. Other well-known players and perhaps an orchestra may be brought in to strengthen the show. Nothing is left undone to make the whole a pleasing and smooth-running entertainment.

It must be understood, of course, that not all musical comedies undergo such strenuous revision. There are times, but not too often, when the show "clicks" with pleasing precision. The producer's worries are then over until the opening night in New York, when the quality and quantity of praise or dispraise on the part of the critics determines the next series of moves. If the criticisms are laudatory, the production continues with but a change here and there. If the piece is described as wobbly and lacking in speed, pep and humor, the producer busies himself and again revisions take place. His worries, however, do not end until the piece meets either with success or abysmal failure. Then and only then is he free to turn his attention to other plays on hand.

There are, of course, other sides to the matter. As not infrequently happens, a producer is in acute disagreement with the critics. He thinks his show is good entertainment, publish.d opinion notwithstanding. A manager's judgment in this respect had often turned defeat into victory. This means a long and expensive fight. Theatre rentals are high, advertising rates have risen, and actors' salaries and production costs being what they are, only those producers with a fat bankroll can stand the financial pressure. The others must bow to the inevitable and call a truce.

THE FURTHER RUMINATIONS OF A. H. WOODS

He Discusses the Guitrys, Although Not Without Digression

Herewith the last recorded utterances of Mr. Woods, just before he sailed to bring back the Guitrys, dead or alive.

By SAMUEL HOFFENSTEIN.

I FOUND Mr. Woods ensconced against the autumnal rain like an easy Vulcan in a comfortable smithy; the very chair and desk seemed to relax under the languid and spacious disposal of his craggy person. The fire in the forge burned low; the vast pile of manuscripts before him seemed undisturbed. I gathered that he may have been toying listlessly with thunder, but that no knockouts would go into rehearsal that afternoon. I was about to ask him if the melancholy fit had fallen upon him, when he greeted me with a tremendous and jocund energy that dissipated all suspicion of sadness and brooding.

"Hello, sucker," is a verbatim report of the salutation.

I was about to fall in with this jovial humor and make a remark or two on my own, when I noticed that the charming Hephaestus had lapsed into his original quietude. The impressive dome was merged in the dusk of the sanctum like mollified granite. I, therefore, reserved the remark or two for a less whimsical auditor and sat down.

We sat. The rain that raineth every day continued to do so. Presently, Mr. Woods, without changing position, etched the characters and usages of several of his colleagues in brief but mordant phrases. In another man they might have been accompanied by heat or even anger. Mr. Woods blasphemed very gently and without rancor. If anything, it seemed to leave him more tranquil.

I ventured to ask the reason for these unfriendly observations. Mr. Woods very amiably invited me to sip something with him in honor of the general state of affairs in the known universe.

The sip was hearty and fruitful. Mr. Woods rose and took a pace or two in all directions. I prepared myself for a peripatetic discourse. Mr. Woods, like the lesser Athenians, often likes to air himself on the hoof.

"They all think I got Guitry over here by offering him more money than the other managers," began the Author of my Income, "but it ain't so. Some of the other fellows offered him as much and couldn't get him. He didn't want to come to America. On the al, I don't know how I got him."

Mr. Woods looked so innocently bewildered by his good fortune that I took the liberty of suggesting that the whole arrangement was due to personal magnetism.

"The influence of the will in human affairs is not to be disparaged, even in these, as they say, gross and material times," I began. "All of life is still not buy and sell, cash and carry, the Hall-Mills case, or the girl you fondly think you left behind you. There is the world of the spirit, whose ramifications in the visible world are incalculable. For instance, by concentrating on that black bottle, I could persuade you to remove the cork, lift it up and——"

Noticing suddenly, at this point, that Mr. Woods was staring at me with an extraordinary expression, I deemed it advisable to let the world of the spirit fend for itself for the nonce. Mr. Woods's expression gradually relaxed into that familiar look which argued gestation and utterance.

"It's all applesauce," said Mr. Woods, embracing my oration and life generally in one memorable phrase. "You get a break or you don't. Years ago I was on a boat going over to England to sell the rights of an American play. One day I noticed a distinguished-looking man having his dinner all alone a few tables away from mine. I asked the waiter who he was. The waiter told me it was Sir Beerbohm Tree. I sent him over a bottle of wine with my compliments, and I got a card from Tree which read: 'Dear Woods—Thank you for remembering me on my birthday.' Well, we got acquainted and I sold him the play. It was a hit, too. Well, was that a break, or wasn't it? Was that a ramification of the spirit? Did I know it was his birthday, because I was a good boy in Harvard and didn't hate Princeton men? A long time ago, when I first broke into the uptown game, the two-dollar top and the Art Theatre, I produced an expensive and elaborate operetta. It looked like a million dollars and it had everything but a tenor. I hunted tenors by sea and by land, and couldn't find one. One day, walking down Broadway, I heard a sound. I traced it into a moving picture house. The sound came from the tenor I had been looking for. That night I tracked him to Brooklyn, signed him up and he was a knockout. Was that personal magnetism? A lot of managers with personal magnetism were probably walking up Sixth and Seventh Avenues at the same time looking for tenors. You either get a break or you don't. Usually you don't, and then there is nothing to do but sell the moving picture rights to cover the losses, or wait until she falls in love with another fellow and goes to Reno."

At this point Mr. Woods sat down and telephoned for reservations on the Homeric, which was sailing for Europe that night. I waited patiently for ten minutes, but as he did not cancel the order and reserve tickets for Chicago, I assumed he might possibly sail for Europe that night.

"I see you are going to Europe, Mr. Woods," I remarked sagely. "How about placing a small bet at 10 to 7 that you end up at Atlantic City?"

"How about a little publicity for the Guitrys, who are opening at the Chanin Theatre on Dec. 27 for a limited engagement in 'Mozart,'" answered Mr. Woods.

"Matinees Thursday and Saturday," I ventured to suggest. "What do the Guitrys want with publicity? Aren't they the most famous people in France. And isn't France the most famous country in America? Besides, either they'll get a break or they won't. If they get a break, they'll be the most famous people in America, and the publicity department won't get any credit for it. If they don't get a break, they'll still be the most famous people in France, and the publicity department will be better off in the Foreign Legion. So what do you want to involve me for in an international affair like this?"

"You might say," continued Mr. Woods, "that I am sailing for Europe tonight for the express purpose of bringing over the Guitrys and their company on Dec. 20, and that their first night, on Dec. 27 at the Chanin Theatre, will be the most brilliant event in the history of the American theatre."

"Did you ever call Guitry 'sweetheart' or 'kid' or did you always stick to the formal 'Monsieur'?"

Mr. Woods confessed, with some show of vehemence, that he had never called anybody Monsieur in his life. I then made bold to suggest that perhaps the other managers who had tried to get M. Guitry to come to America had called him Monsieur, which was no novelty to him, and that Mr. Woods's "kid" had probably startled him into signing a contract.

Mr. Woods did not find it convenient to comment on this astute hypothesis. Observing that he had gone into a pleasant reserve, I left him roaming the boulevards at his leisure, and sneaked out before he could think of anything that might involve my department in a purely modern and unnecessary expenditure of energy.

PARIS LETTER

conventionalities of the Faubourg St. Germain.

Evreinov's "Le Comédie du Bonheur" has been skillfully adapted for the Théâtre de l'Atelier. In it a Dr. Frégoli, who, posing as a fortune teller, has learned the secret sorrows of a dingy boarding house, hires a troupe of actors to give the illusion of happiness to a romantic girl whose life had been saddened by the absence of love, to a morose old man who has no one to play checkers with, to a neurasthenic student who had been contemplating suicide and, lastly, to a most unattractive old maid. The first act of this delightful fantasy is almost Ibsenian in tone. The second, with the parodic rehearsal of "Quo Vadis," savors of the music hall. The third is a farce worthy of Labiche and the fourth an Italian commedia dell' arte. Evreinov, whose name and work are familiar in the United States, is already known on the French stage by his short piece, "La Mort Joyeuse," performed in 1922 at the Vieux-Colombier.

In addition to Ibsen's "John Gabriel Borkman," magnificently revived at the Maison de l'Oeuvre, another notable foreign venture here is the cycle of Russian and other plays performed in Russian at the Comédie des Champs-Elysées by Mme. Marie Guermanova, Stanislavsky's favorite pupil and associate in the Moscow Art Theatre. The French actor, Jean d'Yd, reads before every tableau a French synopsis of the action in the various plays presented, the first being Dostoievsky's "The Brothers Karamazov," to be followed by his "The Village Stepanchico," Tchekhov's "Cherry Orchard," Ibsen's "The Lady from the Sea" and several comedies by Ostrovsky.

Edward Stirling and his company of The English Players at the Théâtre Albert Ier have scored another triumph in John Galsworthy's "Escape," which, with its ten episodic scenes, is rather a portrait gallery or, if I may use the phrase, a psychological film than a play proper. Rich in philosophical meaning, summarized in the moral which Matt draws: "It's one's decent self one can't escape," it is often unconvincing from a dramatic point of view. The unrelieved imbecility of Galsworthy's policemen, the convict's long and undisturbed conversation with his mate, the ease with which he escapes, are rather hard to believe. A distinctly new feature of the author's talent is his ability to provoke frequent outbursts of laughter. The interpretation of Mr. Stirling and his associates is perfection itself.

The production of musical comedies continues unabated. At the Théâtre de la Michodière, Paul Haurigot's short-lived "Méditerranée," the subject of which is the same as that of Roland Dorgelès's recent novel "Partir," has just been replaced by "Le Temps d'Aimer," a musical comedy or rather comic opera, the book of which is by Pierre Wolff and Henri Duvernois and the score by the indefatigable Reynaldo Hahn, with sprightly "couplets" by the poet, Hugues Delorme. It deals with a retired Ambassador who is a quinquagenarian and who, wishing to appear 30 to his young wife, has secret conferences with a beauty specialist whom he passes off as his notary and goes away on monthly "business trips" which are in reality rest cures spent at the home of his former flame, the actress Suzette of the Comédie-Française. This exquisite divertissement is charmingly played.

MAURICE BOURGEOIS.

ON THE LONDON STAGE

Reflections on Tragedy Induced by "Jane Clegg" and "Riceyman Steps"

LONDON, Dec. 1.

IN an early essay on "The Laws of Change" in the theatre A. B. Walkley said that as pure comedy, or "high comedy," must disappear with the passing away of those social distinctions that lie at its psychological root, so men's full relish for pure tragedy in the Aeschylean manner vanished with their belief in the arbitrary intervention of Fate in human affairs. This, as Walkley himself was well aware, is not the whole truth about comedy, for comedy depends as much on differences of character as on differences of manners or class, and of character mankind may be trusted to preserve for many generations to come enough variety to keep comedians alive; but it is abundantly true of Greek tragedy, as we have of late had every opportunity to observe. Not only does Sybil Thorndike from time to time perform Greek plays in translation; not only does there exist and flourish a Greek Play Society which sometimes makes us its guests on Sunday nights; but there has now arisen in Cambridge a new Festival Theatre which opened last week with the "Orestein." Unhappily I did not see this performance, but the news I have of it confirms me in two conclusions already formed on the basis of the Greek Play Society's work—first, that there is an increasing public in England for scholarly production of this nature, and, secondly, that the interest of this public in what it sees is at least as much academic as emotional. I do not mean that the audiences sit through these plays unmoved; that is very far from being true. But I think we have not now the power to lose ourselves in them, to identify ourselves with their characters and to suffer their torment and triumph in our own persons. Why? Is not the reason the one which Walkley implied—that we are no longer able to regard ourselves as the playthings or instruments of forces external to ourselves? The Greeks, too, recognised free will; they were not "fatalists" in the vulgar sense; but their philosophy threw upon the gods a great part of the responsibility which, perhaps bravely, perhaps arrogantly, we shoulder ourselves. Nothing in our own lives is, in the dramatic sense, "pure" tragedy—the tragedy of men maddened by the gods or driven by the Furies, because we have reached, or are pleased to suppose that we have reached, an age of reason, and to this extent we create our own gods and our own Furies and carry them within us. Therefore, when we are spectators of Greek tragedy we look upon a stage life which reflects a system of thought radically different from our own, and we are bound to remain not participators in spirit, but spectators merely.

Are we to say, then, that "pure" tragedy is dead; that we have outgrown or have lost its simple-mindedness? I think that is the plain truth. We are absorbed in it, we are moved by it, but our absorption and emotion have an unusual quality. They are the product of a kind of dilettantism, an interest in the strange and rare, not of personal identification and sympathy. We miss in a Greek play that illusion which is the gift of great plays whose spirit is nearer to our own. But it will be objected at once that there is tragedy on the modern stage—how, then, can tragedy be dead? The answer is that the word has changed its meaning. The "Oedipus Tyrannus" and such a play as St. John Ervine's "Jane Clegg" both fall within the same nominal classification, but obviously they are not plays of the same nature. The truth is that our critical classifications have long been outworn. Plays of a new kind have sprung up and we continue to impose upon them names—tragedy, comedy, farce—that are no longer applicable to them.

During the past week we have been given two modern tragedies—Ervine's play that I have already mentioned and an adaptation by Michael Morton of Arnold Bennett's novel, "Riceyman Steps." I confess that any adaptation of "Riceyman Steps" short of an entirely fresh treatment of the book's theme was, in my view, doomed to failure for the good reason that the lines of the book's development cannot be dramatically followed. The novel, as its many readers will already be aware, is a study of avarice in a mean quarter of London, and the novelist's method is to obtain his tragic effect not by the impact of outward events and actions, but a slow accumulation of tragic atmosphere. There is in the story itself the story of how a miser gradually starved himself and his wife to death—nothing heroic, nothing but a steady piling up of the detail of sordidness and misery. Yet the final effect is a gigantic one; the pile, so to speak, is greater than the aggregate of its parts. In the theatre the same effect cannot be obtained by the same method of piling up detail. The dramatist, restricted by time and the limitations of the stage, is compelled to select a detail here and there and to emphasize it. But the details which in the novel had a vast collective strength will not in detachment bear dramatic emphasis. That the miser is eager to turn off the gas fire or is angry because his starved servant girl has stolen food is, on the stage, not of much significance, and the dramatist's emphasis on these acts instead of making them impressive makes them slightly ridiculous. The result is an exhibition of tragic facts without a communication to the audience of the tragic spirit.

Mr. Ervine's work, not a new one but not yet so familiar to the world as it deserves to be, is a striking contrast to "Riceyman Steps." It is being performed by the Lena Ashwell Players at a little, outlying theatre of their own, The Century. This is the story of Jane Clegg, a strong, brave, determined woman, and of her husband, a weak, selfish, deceitful man. Gradually she discovers his misdeeds—that he has defrauded his employers; that he has allowed her to save him from prison by making good the loss out of her own money; and, finally, that he stole for no other reason than that he intended to desert her and her children and set out for Canada with another woman. I have said deliberately that she discovers his "misdeeds," for the character of the man, from which these misdeeds spring so naturally and inevitably that they surprise neither her nor ourselves, is known to her at the outset and by Mr. Ervine's artistry brilliantly indicated to us. Here, then, is the link between Greek tragedy and the best modern tragedy. Over the action of each presides a ruling force which on the Greek stage we may call fate and on our own character. In each case the action is felt to be inevitable, but in one the responsibility is external and on the other, except in so far as each of us may blame our ancestors for the evil in ourselves, it is internal. Hardy, in his great tragic novels, is so well aware of this connection between the Greeks and ourselves that he actually uses the terminology of Greek tragedy, speaking of Fate and of the President of the Immortals, to describe what is in fact the conception of character upon the actions of men, and goes yet further toward the Greek tradition in his repeated use of chance and coincidence, which are indeed independent of character and are modern equivalents of the gods' arbitrary intervention in human affairs. Mr. Ervine is a faithful carrier of the tragic torch. His work is formidable, unsentimental, austere. It has these qualities in so high a degree that even a certain cold beauty results from them, like the beauty of a grey sea or a sunless day of Winter. What he does not possess is the Greek exaltation—that strange spiritual flame that fills the darknesses of the world with poetry and passion. He has not the Greeks' thunder, their power to throw over their scene the shadow of impending doom; he has the spirit and substance of the tragic drama, but not yet its lightning.

CHARLES MORGAN.

GOSSIP OF THE VAUDEVILLE STAGE

A COMBAT team of United States Marines will be a vaudeville attraction at the Hippodrome this week. It is under the command of Major A. Drexel Biddle of Philadelphia, who will appear with it at every performance in what is said to be his first stage engagement. A combat team of United States Marines being whatever it is, the Hippodrome has planned to make something of an event of its presentation and is arranging army, navy and marine nights, with possibly a special matinee for second lieutenants. At all events the situation on Sixth Avenue appears to be well in hand, for another feature of the variety bill will be a dance act called "Les Folies Rouges" or, as the billing parenthetically explains, "The Red Follies," which is, it further develops, a Harry Roye production.

The Palace will house those perennial favorites, Rooney and Bent, in, to use one of vaudeville's favorite words, a divertissement of their usual songs, dances and comedy specialties. At the head of their company will be Pat Rooney 3d, one of the most promising of the oncoming hoofers. Further contributors to the entertainment will be Georgie Price and Ernest Glendinning, the former, it seems, being the headliner.

According to an elaborate and complete statement from the Keith-Albee offices, the vaudeville centennial celebration started off as a success. All of the 600 theatres announced to participate did, and, although final returns are not . . , those at hand indicate that even one or two more houses may have smacked into the festivities.

Some idea of the thoroughness with which "All-Nationality Week" was staged may be gleaned from the following paragraph of the communiqué:

"The leading factors in religion, education and commercial organizations; officers of the army and the navy; clergymen of all sects and faiths—Catholic and Protestant, Jew and atheist — caught the international Americanism of the plan, and gladly commended it in letters and even from their pulpits. The centennial celebration of vaudeville, launched with 'All Nationality Week,' has spread with amazing unanimity all over the United States and Canada and must be regarded as one of the most unanimous and enthusiastic demonstrations of public approval and admiration for the branch of American amusement just closing its first hundred years of constant progress."

To which the answer indubitably is "yes."

Hardeen, brother of Houdini and heir to all his secrets, his paraphernalia and his showman's equipment is preparing to appear in a new act in which he will duplicate most of Houdini's feats. . . Laurette Taylor is to be seen in vaudeville at the Orpheum Palace, Chicago, this week in a playlet by her husband, J. Hartley Manners. . . . Among the "name" attractions recently signed for the Loew theatres are Edna Wallace Hopper, McIntyre and Heath, Nora Bayes, Irene Franklin, Jane and Katherine Lee, Arthur Prince (at the State this week) and Cissie Loftus. They will be seen in the de luxe picture theatres as well as in the vaudeville houses.

A condensed version of "Six-Cylinder Love" is to be seen in Keith-Albee vaudeville shortly after the holidays. Milt Lewis of Al Lewis, Inc., is arranging it and he may play the Ernest Truex rôle himself. This same organization is also preparing a shortened version of "The Nervous Wreck."

Jane Cowl and Frank Fay will be at the Riverside this week. . . Fannie Ward will show Brooklyn matrons how she does it at the E. F. Albee, where there will be only Will Mahoney to say her nay. . . Miss Patrician's doubtless palpitating public may find her at the Eighty-first Street for the next seven days.

A. H. Woods begs to express his appreciation of the instant and enthusiastic response to the coming of these distinguished artists and their entire French company in "MOZART" at the Chanin Theatre on December 27th, which has resulted in a demand for tickets unprecedented in the American theatre.

Because of the shortness of the engagement, and on account of the extraordinary number of requests for reservations, it is suggested that those who have not already made arrangements for tickets do so at once.

The prices for the opening night will be from five to twenty-five dollars; for other evening performances from two to six dollars; for the Thursday and Saturday matinees from two to five dollars, plus tax.

For reservations, address A. H. Woods, 236 W. 42nd Street.

The Prima Donna of "The Pirates"—A Newcomer From England —A Property Man—Concerning Mr. Nairn and Mrs. Mack

THIS is the story of the discovery of the new Gilbert and Sullivan prima donna. It is, in fact, nothing less than the inside information about how Ruth Thomas came to play the rôle of Mabel in Winthrop Ames's revival of "The Pirates of Penzance," and any other accounts, it seems, are to be regarded as unauthorized.

To go back to the beginning Miss Thomas was born in Mississippi, which, however, is not obligatory for prima donnas. Soon after her birth she began to sing and then, although the connection is not quite clear, the Thomas family moved to Atlanta, Ga. There, and not in Savannah, as some scurrilous reports have it, her musical education began.

Now for an enlightening episode. Miss Thomas was not discovered by a prima donna, according to formula, but by a composer. Sylvio Hein was at that time—about five years ago—in Atlanta, and there he heard her sing. He found a part for her in "Look Who's Here" with Cecil Lean and Cleo Mayfield. They came to New York and Miss Thomas found another rôle in "Snapshots of 1921" and then appeared in the Weber and Fields revival, after which she followed Grace Moore in a touring company of the Music Box Revue.

Meantime, employing what seemed to be an ability to attract the attention of composers, Miss Thomas was rediscovered by Edgar Varese, who, too, believed that she had a voice worth while, and took her to Walter Kiesewetter to have it trained.

Last Summer the singer came to the Ames office with a letter of introduction from Sam H. Harris. Mr. Ames received her, talked to her and heard her sing. But as he had nothing for her at that time he asked for her home address in case he should need her. Miss Thomas gave the address as 21 Minetta Lane. She had no phone, but was going to have one installed soon and would send in the number, which she never did. . . .

Six months elapsed and Mr. Ames began his search for a Mabel. He confered with Johnson Briscoe, his casting director, who suggested several names, none of which pleased the latest nominee for the presidency. Then Mr. Ames remembered having heard, during the Summer, a voice he had liked. Who, what or where was this girl? Mr. Ames's secretary was speedily dispatched to search the files. There were recorded the name and place: Miss Ruth Thomas, 21 Minetta Lane.

As there was no telephone at that address the only way to get in communication with the prospect was by telegraph. When that failed, a personal search for her was undertaken by the Ames office. The highways and byways of Greenwich Village were scoured—Minetta Lane, Minetta Place, Minetta Street, Minetta Boulevard, Minetta Avenue, Rue Minetta, Minetta Strasse, and Plaisa Minetta all failed to disclose the whereabouts of Miss Thomas.

Clues led uptown, downtown and in various ladies' chambers, and only the circumstance that Miss Thomas wandered into the Ames office and gave herself up led to her being in the cast of "The Pirates." But she still insists that she lives at 21 Minetta Lane, and she has the solemn promise of the telephone company that almost any day now the phone will be installed.

as "promising," assumed that difficult part she received every possible aid from George Tyler and Basil Dean, and even from the members of the cast.

When she was a pupil at the Royal Academy four years ago things were not so easy for Miss Thomson, nor was help forthcoming. Kenneth Barnes, under whose administration the school is conducted, and Claude Rains, whom she later married—for spite, she says—were under suspicion of staying awake nights to think up ways of making it difficult for her.

When the school produced "The Jest," class room gossip had it that she was to play the leading female part—one for which she was unquestionably fitted. But instead they gave her the rôle of the wicked, deep-voiced brother, acted here originally by Lionel Barrymore and later by Alphonz Ethier.

The next year, when the academy put on Somerset Maugham's "Caroline," it was Miss Thomson who was selected to play the name part. Her appearance in that rôle had two immediate results: first, she won the school medal for the highest attainment of the year, and second, Basil Dean engaged her for a two-year period under his direction.

She is the daughter of Albert Thomson, a Colonel in the Twenty-third London Regiment and a director of public companies. Her inclination toward the theatre was neither because of nor in spite of her family; on the whole they rather encouraged her desire for a stage career.

Under Mr. Dean's direction, she made her first professional appearance as Mabel, the young wife, in his production of "Loyalties." Next she appeared in "R. U. R." and in "The Great Broxopp," both of short duration, and they were followed by "Lilies of the Field," in which Meggie Albanesi and Edna Best played. In that piece, she understudied Miss Albanesi, but made only a few appearances in the rôle left vacant by the premature death of one of England's youngest stars. Miss Thomson then understudied Hermione Baddeley in Galsworthy's "The Forest."

Shortly afterward she was discussing her work with Mr. Rains, under whose more or less negative guidance she had prospered at school. Mr. Rains's connection there had merely been incidental to his position as one of London's best-known young players and most capable directors. Under Sir Herbert Tree, he had risen from call boy to general stage director, and in addition he enjoyed the reputation of being as skillful an actor as he was director—a position somewhat analogous to that of Dudley Digges in America. After the proper amount of consideration—professional and otherwise—Mr. Rains and Miss Thomson were married in November, 1924, and celebrated the occasion by playing together in Shaw's "Getting Married." Joint appearances in the revival of "The Rivals," produced by Nigel Playfair, followed. Miss Thomson also acted Polly Eccles in a revival of Robertson's "Caste" and played in "Two Gentlemen of Verona."

There were those critics who hailed her appearance in Tchekhov's "Three Sisters" and as Agiaia in the adaptation of "The Idiot" as being responsible for the current vogue of Russian plays in the British capital. Then she played a short engagement in "The Years Between" from the French of Jean Jacques Bernard, but what may be described as an insistent public demand necessitated a revival of "Three Sisters," in which she again acted from Monday to the Friday immediately prior to her sailing for America to appear in the current production of "The Constant Nymph."

Ernest Berry's Little World.

THE world of Ernest Berry is much stranger than that, say, of William Claxsold or of Lewis Carroll. Mr. Berry's is a world of bouncing eggs and plaster of paris pastry and mechanical canary birds. In a word, Mr. Berry is a property man.

Currently, he is the titular head of the commissary, quartermaster and wardrobe departments for "The Squall." A silent and taciturn individual, Mr. Berry hints that he has fallen upon evil days. Never before have his ingenuity and resource been so tautly stretched. His aplomb was shaken to its foundation on Wednesday afternoon, and, although a man of action rather than phrases, he was moved to voice a lament just prior to the matinee.

"Man and boy," said Mr. Berry, as he leaned against a swaying thunder-drum, "I have been a property man for twenty-five years but this is the first time that I ever had to dye the ingénue's trunks. Things have come to a pretty pass. It wasn't like that in the good old days."

An inquiry as to the cause of Mr. Berry's profound melancholy developed the fact that the negligee worn by the Gypsy wheedler, Nubi, as she practices her Romany riddles on the hc se of Mendes in the second act, was to be brown at the matinee, whereas it had been white the evening before and all other evenings since the inaugural. Not until ten minutes of 2 of that afternoon had the announcement been made that her trunks, of necessity, must be brown, too. Thus was Mr. Berry called to the colors, and hence his plaintive small-talk.

The perishable properties of Mr. Berry are of greater concern to him than the shotguns and bombs which he regulates during the typhoon that rattles and roars during the first act. Pea soup and rye bread, whipped cream and ripe olives, tobacco and claret wine are on his nightly menu. The family Mendez is at table during the first act, celebrating the twentieth wedding anniversary of Mendes père and Mendes mère; and, a stickler for realism, Mr. Berry sees to it that their food is genuine, rather than in effigy. The cake, to be sure, is a plaster of paris cake tricked out with gewgaws, and Mr. Berry relates with pride of the hours he spent in painting this cake. Had Mr. Berry his way, it would be a real cake. He purchases two brown Leghorn eggs each night, with which Miss Yurka is to fashion the innards of an honest confection; but the realism goes no further—it is still a property cake.

The claret is real, for the very good reason that Mr. Berry made it himself. This chronicler has tasted it and can testify to its potentialities.

The master of properties points with pride to the Spanish dishes. On their underside is scrawled "V. P. Spain." The decorative pattern indicates flying pansies and indolent bluebirds.

"Those plates cost three bucks apiece," volunteers Mr. Berry, "and they are real Spanish plates; but did you hear about the canaries? I bought two real birds on Eighth Avenue for eight berries; but they won't sing, so I had to get a mechanical bird to supply the lyrics. The best thing of its kind I have ever seen. It sounds more like a canary than a canary itself. It's in that box, and when I pull the string the magneto and the clock and the whistle start to go, and—."

Here the complex technicalities of the strange pine box from which issued the lute-like notes of the canary overcame Mr. Berry, and the subject was dropped, to be replaced by a talk on the bouncing eggs. The Easter eggs which Miss Yurka brings on in the last act are made of rubber, it seems, and should one of them drop on the floor there will be an unchartered laugh in the script.

A Spanish bridle for an unseen Spanish horse, a cowbell that is rung by one of Mr. Berry's aides, rather than by an Andalusian cow, some manufactured mud with which to paint the shoes of the players who have trudged all the way from Granada through the storm, a twelve-gauge shotgun for the thunderclap, a handsome wooden Casaba melon, a string of dried red peppers, an authentic ham, and an equally authentic string of Castilian sausages, a bunch of paper celery, candles for the statue of the Virgin, pearls bought with many filched and counterfeit centimos for the neck of the wanton Nubi, two gallons of shot for the rumble machine, two Forty-eighth Street roses, great bunches of Granada dahlias of tissue and muslin—all these are in the curious category over which Mr. Berry holds sway.

About Ralph Nairn.

THE ironies of life were never better illustrated than in the career of Ralph Nairn, who plays the unpronounceable Johann Dwornitschek in "The Play's the Thing," the Molnar comedy now in full possession of Henry Miller's Theatre. But how and why this is so the reader will have to discover for himself.

Nairn, who, like many other successful Englishmen, is Scotch, was at University College in London, studying to become an architect, when an accident changed the whole course of his life. An ardent football player, he was seriously injured during a game, sustaining a fractured spine. He felt himself incapacitated for the life of an architect and, as he had always had a turn for music, drifted into vaudeville. For several years he entertained English music hall audiences by sitting at the piano, playing and singing his own compositions. He wrote the score of "The Honorable Phil," in which G. P. Huntley played many years ago. In 1904 his "Come My Lad and Be a Soldier" was the song hit of England. His latest number, "I Want the Kisses That You Give," is about to be brought out by a New York music publisher. Thus is progress recorded in the song-writing business.

From vaudeville to musical comedy was a natural and inevitable step for any one with Nairn's comedy gift. "Veronique" and "The Rose of Algeria" were two pieces of this sort in which he was seen. His first appearance in straight comedy took place some twelve years ago, under Charles Frohman, in support of Gertrude Elliott in Pinero's "Preserving Mr. Panmure."

During rehearsals of the Pinero play both Mr. Frohman and Miss Elliott repeatedly warned Nairn that he must not gag. "You can hardly improve on Pinero," Miss Elliott said to him. Nairn took these admonishments much to heart and when the opening night came he was in a thoroughly chastened mood. Not an uncalled-for mot would slip past his lips if he could help it. He would speak pure Pinero and nothing else but. All went well during the try-out. But when the New York opening night arrived Nairn discovered that the express company had failed to deliver his trunk. This was a near-tragedy, for in it were his dress clothes which, as an English gentleman, he was in honor bound to wear in the second act. He hunted the theatre high and low, but when his cue came he was still attired in business clothes. Mr. Frohman was in the wings. "Never mind," he said; "when you go on just apologize to the ladies and explain to them that you've lost your trunk." "But," Nairn protested, "Pinero didn't write that!" "Can't you gag?" Mr. Frohman exclaimed scornfully, as he shoved Nairn on the stage. And gag Nairn did. "I'm so sorry to be in these clothes," he said, "but my man, Adams, has lost my trunk."

Since his appearance here five years ago with Tessa Kosta in "Lassie," Nairn has been playing in London in "Lilac Time," "Her Temporary Husband," "Mercenary Mary" and other such pieces.

An Actress From the Open Spaces.

IF a certain stock company which once flourished in Salt Lake City had not selected "Cameo Kirby" as one of its productions, it is quite unlikely that a 12-year old school girl would have become imbued with the desire for a stage career. Thus she probably would never have met the owner and leading man of the organization, whom she married some years later, and she probably would not have been the subject of this article. And then again she might have.

The young actress is Beatrice Banyard-Mack, now playing Mina Keason in David Belasco's "annual melodramatic production," "Lily Sue," at the Lyceum. In private life she is the wife of Willard Mack, author of this melodrama and currently just about Mr. Belasco's favorite playwright. Accordingly Mr. Mack is the actor who unknowingly turned her footsteps toward the theatre, and he certainly seems to have done his part in shouldering the blame, if any.

Like many another young Salt Lake City girl, Miss Banyard was a frequent attendant at the matinee performances of Mr. Mack's company. One afternoon the actor, as was his custom, made a speech between the acts in the course of which he vouchsafed the information that "Cameo Kirby" would be one of his early productions.

Having seen this play a year before, Miss Banyard chanced to remember there was a boy's part in it and she determined that she would like to play it. The next morning, instead of going to school, she went to the theatre. She met James Rennie, who was a member of the company, introduced herself and told him the object of her visit. He took her to Mr. Mack and briefly explained the situation, with the result that she was engaged and appeared as the Little General when "Cameo Kirby" was eventually produced.

The Banyard family, however, objected to their daughter's theatrical ambitions, so after playing this part they decided she should make no more stage appearances—at least not until she had completed her education. Seven years elapsed and then she began her career in earnest by joining a stock company.

Four years ago, Mr. Mack returned to Salt Lake City, and the manager of the theatre where his troupe had held forth requested him to play an engagement in some of his better known rôles. He consented, and among the company which appeared with him during the engagement was none other than Miss Banyard, who was cast in two of his plays. Mr. Mack did not seem to remember her, so finally she divulged the fact that she was the child of the "Cameo Kirby" days. . . . Utah being what it is, six weeks later they were married. Following that Mrs. Mack played in vaudeville, and in California in "Red Bulldogs," one of her husband's plays which has not been presented here.

Two seasons ago, New York theatregoers saw Mrs. Mack for the first time in another Mack melodrama, "The Dove." She was the young girl from Iowa whose amazing luck furnished some amusing moments in the gambling scene.

When her husband acted last season in "Canary Dutch," she played a young, gum-chewing flapper. While awaiting the opening of "Lily Sue" this season she supported Mr. Mack in a vaudeville tour of "Kick In."

PROVINCETOWN PLANS.

Further news of "In Abraham's Bosom" is that its cast will include Julius Bledsoe and Rose McClendon, both late of "Deep River." And after this play the Provincetown group will start work on a Mozart operetta called "La Finta Giardiniera," said to be as yet without performance in this country.

A REPORT FROM IRELAND

The Abbey Theatre's Predicament, With Some Comment on the Hinterland

DUBLIN, Nov. 29.

THE scarcity of plays by native dramatists is fast becoming a matter of serious import. Last season the number of new plays produced at the Abbey was fewer than six, while the current season to date has been productive of only two. Of these "Mr. Murphy's Island," the mystery of whose authorship has never been cleared up, may be dismissed as mere pleasant entertainment. The second, Lennox Robinson's "The Big House," has had, after an interval of two months, a week's revival. It was claimed by a few that this play would not bear a second visit, but the contrary obtains. The oftener one sees this play the more one discovers in it.

The author himself has expressed doubts as to its having an appeal for audiences outside of Ireland. Robinson is a very modest, shy young man, and, while he is not afraid to tackle big themes, he is ever nervous as to how his work will strike neutral audiences. It is possible that "The Big House" would, in its present form, contain some things that would be unintelligible to audiences unfamiliar with the events of Irish history from 1918 to 1923. But such details could be excised without in any way taking from the interest or effectiveness of the play as a whole. However, that is neither here nor there.

The main question is, What is going to become of Irish drama if the native playwrights have ceased to produce? It is no secret that the Abbey is crying out for plays, and that in their absence the directorate is forced to take advantage of the clause in the theatre's charter which permits the production of a limited number of foreign masterpieces during the course of each season. Under this authority Sierra Martinez's "The Two Shepherds" has already been presented. It did not, however, attract large audiences and, to make up the deficit, Synge's "The Playboy of the Western World" was revived. In the revival it was played "with a difference" and to complete disadvantage. If one were not familiar with the play in the library, one would unhesitatingly condemn the work, as presented a week or so ago by the Abbey players, as sheer, boring nonsense. It was turned into farce, and, when the dialogue was not robbed of its poetry, the players gave the impression that they were presenting a burlesque. No Weber and Fields travesty of a Broadway success could have approached the inanity of this new way of playing a masterpiece. Those who remembered the original production with Fred O'Donovan, J. M. Kerrigan, Sara Allgood and Arthur Sinclair writhed in their seats as they watched the progress of the first act. They did not wait for the others.

The contrast was all the greater in that the Synge comedy was preceded by T. C. Murray's delightful little "poet's play," "Spring," which was beautifully acted. Another Abbey experiment during the past month was a production of "The Importance of Being Earnest," in the costumes of the '90s. The producer was Lennox Robinson, and, while we bow to his ability as a playwright, his ideas of production are open to question. The Wilde play deals with artificial people, but Mr. Robinson imposed artificiality upon artificiality and the result was disastrous.

These productions are gaining for the Abbey company a reputation for incompetency. Indeed, it is openly said that it cannot do these plays. Nor is it to be wondered that it fails in them. Trained, even drilled, for years in the manners, speech and gait of the Irish peasant, it has become second nature for the members of the company to slip into the peasant the moment they step on the Abbey stage. Nor have they themselves any delusions as to the difficulty of getting rid of the cloak which has now practically become part of themselves. The present ensemble of the Abbey has been in existence for well-nigh ten years and it contains some exceedingly clever people whose places it would be hard to fill if they should decide to sever connection. But in their efforts to fit themselves into parts other than Irish they are developing mannerisms of speech and facial expression which have begun to react upon their regular work.

Of course, the explanation of what one might describe as the decay of the Abbey lies in the failure of the native authors to supply the theatre with plays. The directorate is making every effort to fill in the blanks. The situation constitutes a problem not easy to solve, and if a solution is not found soon, there will be no native plays forthcoming and the Abbey will lapse into becoming an echo of foreign stages, and an indifferent echo at that, until the company has been refreshed or replaced.

On the other hand, the Gaelic Players, who came into existence less than four years ago, are making rapid strides in the direction of creating a Gaelic drama, as distinct from Anglo-Irish drama. Unfettered by any limitations laid down by a charter as to the standard of works which they may produce, they have made translations of plays which are several grades above the average commercial English or American play, although they do not reach the standard represented by Continental masterpieces. These come within the scope of the players, and they give convincing performances of them. They have, incidentally, inspired Gaelic writers to become prolific. Thus, while Anglo-Irish dramatic literature is being starved, Gaelic literature is gradually increasing in volume. The Gaelic Players appear once a month for one performance only, from October to May, but their audiences are increasing in size at such a rate that it is a question of only another season or so before they will be obliged to increase the number of performances.

This, in turn, will create another problem, that of finding a theatre. At present the Gaelic productions are made at the Abbey on the first Monday of each month, but the directorate of that theatre will not be willing to give up the stage for even one additional night. There was a time when the Abbey's week opened on Tuesday night, but in recent years it became necessary to use every evening for box office purposes if the theatre was to keep going. Nor can they, despite the Government subsidy, afford to forego the receipts of a single night even now.

For a city of its size and population Dublin is badly provided for, so far as theatres and halls are concerned, and this fact stands in the way of experimental work in the shape of productions of a really practical and useful nature by enthusiastic amateurs or quasi-professionals. Of the latter there are sufficient in Dublin to assemble some excellent casts. Indeed, were a theatre of the Little kind available, the Irish capital would be able to follow in the footsteps of Liverpool, Birmingham, Hull and other English centres and boast of a repertory theatre which would serve as a school for Irish dramatists. There is only one commercial theatre in Dublin today, and for the greater part of the year this is given over to traveling English musical comedy companies. A sop is thrown to music lovers in the form of three weeks of grand opera by the Carl Rosa company and a second like term of Gilbert and Sullivan by the D'Oyly Carte company.

In the provincial cities, such as Cork, Limerick, Waterford, &c., which, twenty years ago, were visited every week from September to June by first-class English companies, the situation is even worse than it is in Dublin. Cork manages every now and then to catch a company touring the south of England, but Limerick and Waterford have been long since eliminated. To meet the situation in these cities amateur companies are springing up, but they are confining their efforts to producing Abbey successes. In time they will have exhausted Irish drama as the Abbey has already exhausted it, and there will be nothing left but the movies, which have penetrated into every little village in the country.

LONDON BY CABLE

LONDON, Dec. 11.—Arch Selwyn informed a representative of THE NEW YORK TIMES that he has definitely arranged to bring Jane Cowl here to appear as Juliet at His Majesty's in March. An English Romeo is now being sought. Mr. Selwyn had Rollo Peters in mind for the part, but he could not come. The play will be presented by William Gaunt, the Shuberts' associate here, but the Shuberts will not be interested in the production. Mr. Gaunt will also produce Frederick Lonsdale's "League of Nations"—Arthur Hopkins will stage it in New York.

International theatrical reciprocity will be established in some degree when Herbert Mundin, Jessie Matthews and other members of the "Charlot Revue" cast go over to appear in the Earl Carroll "Vanities." Mr. Charlot's show will be succeeded at the Prince of Wales by "Happy Go Lucky," which will utilize an orchestra from the Kit Kat Club as part of the performance, dispensing with the usual orchestra musicians. The cast includes Marion Saki and Billie Taylor.

Charles Gulliver, managing director of the Palladium and London Theatres of Varieties, Ltd., who has just returned from America, has secured the London rights to "The Donovan Affair." Albert de Courville and Mr. Gulliver will sponsor the production here.

Mr. Gulliver states that he was unimpressed by the bulk of the American attractions. "There are a few lin-outstanding successes," he said, "but the competition to acquire them for England is far too keen. Ludicrous percentages and large shares of the profits are asked. I am afraid some English managers have acquired some unprofitable bargains. I've come back from America with a strong desire to encourage the writing of musical plays by English playwrights and composers. Within the next year or two I expect to present an English musical play."

"The Country Wife," by William Wycherly, which, except for some performances by theatre societies, has not had a London production since 1748, is to be produced in a few days. Athene Seyler and Isabel Jeans will be in the cast.

Graham Moffatt, who wrote "Bunty Pulls the Strings," has written a play called "Granny." Its heroine is an octogenerian who, though bedridden, succeeds like Bunty, by pulling strings in her household and in the village.

A middle-aged housewife, narrow-minded in her outlook and a domestic tyrant in her conduct, is the description of the principal rôle in "Aspidistras," by Joan Temple, which opened at the Strand this week. The play possesses well-drawn characters, but an unconvincing plot.

George Conquest, an animal mime and comedian, died this week. He was 69 years old. While performing in a flying ballet in America he devised a pantomime called "The Grim Gob-

FROM THE DRAMATIC MAIL BAG

The Elderly Gentleman's Lapse.

To the Dramatic Editor:

It seems to be a common failing of the elderly that, although they distinctly remember details of their youth, they forget utterly happenings of recent times. All of which is apropos of the reminiscences of an Elderly Gentleman on "The Pirates of Penzance," as recorded by Johnson Briscoe in last Sunday's TIMES. Doubtless many others within the past two days have felt impelled to jog the memory of the Old Gentleman, via Mr. Briscoe, but I cannot resist adding my jog, too.

Where was the Elderly Gentleman—and Mr. Briscoe—when the Society of American Singers gave "The Pirates" at the Park Theatre in 1918 and again in 1919? Creditable performances they were, too—at least the second one was—too creditable to go unrecorded.

In 1918, on Nov. 4, the company first revived the operetta, giving it, all told, for eleven performances.

In 1919, on Dec. 15, it was given again, this time for seven performances. In this second revival—which was the one I saw—the principal rôles were distributed as follows:

Herbert Waterous was Richard. Morton Adkins—who died only a few days ago, I understand—was Samuel, his lieutenant. Craig Campbell and Ralph Brainard alternated as Frederic. Frank Moulan was the General Stanley. William Danforth was the Sergeant. James, a pirate, was Richard Bold, more recently leading man in George White's "Scandals" and in other musical productions. The Mabel was Irene Williams, who only a week or so ago was singing "Giroflé-Girofla" in the American wing of the Franco-American Opera Comique company at Jolson's Theatre. Gladys Caldwell was Edith and Ruth was done by Sarah Edwards.

If the Elderly Gentleman had only known of that revival—less than six years ago—he wouldn't have "crashed" Mr. Ames's rehearsal, perhaps, though I don't blame him one bit for wanting to hear "The Pirates" music again at the earliest possible moment.

O'Neill to the Full.

To the Dramatic Editor:

In all the discriminating and appreciative criticisms which have appeared concerning the revival of Eugene O'Neill's "Beyond the Horizon" I have not noticed any stress upon one outstanding feature. When I say that I went to New York especially to have an opportunity of seeing the last scene, which was omitted in the first production of the play in 1920, you will understand my keen interest in the result. I have been telling classes for some years that the full meaning of "Beyond the Horizon" is only to be gained when this last scene on the hilltop is produced, and the result as I saw it in the theatre fully bears out my contention. I still believe that "Beyond the Horizon" is the finest play Mr. O'Neill has written. In it we see his own aspirations for the beauty of adventure, and the total effect of the play is that of exultation, which is the acid test of tragedy.

Incidentally, I also saw on my last visit a most unusual production which has been very variously received, Mr. Davis's play, "The Ladder." With the theory of reincarnation, upon which the play is based, I am not particularly sympathetic as a dramatic motive. But what impressed me and interested me greatly was the way in which the acting, especially of Miss Perry, triumphed over the difficulties of the constant change of character. The production is a thing of beauty in itself, and to any student of the theatre the production must be most interesting. I think it rather a pity that the play cannot be judged on its own merits rather than as a vehicle for propaganda.

DEAF MUTES PERFORM IN MOTION PICTURES

AN experiment conceived eight years ago and worked out last Summer is about to be issued in its film form. It is a two-reel comedy entitled "His Busy Hour," with a cast of deaf-mutes.

In 1918 James O. Spearing, then motion-picture editor of THE NEW YORK TIMES, met a number of deaf-mutes, and it occurred to him that they were possible screen actors. Subsequently, he ran across a passage from Montaigne in which the French essayist remarked upon the "perfection" with which deaf-mutes could make themselves understood to normal hearing people by natural gestures and expressions. Then, too, it was known that a number of leading actors of the screen and stage were the children of deaf-mute parents who had imparted to them a natural pantomimic expressiveness.

These and other observations led Mr. Spearing to entertain the idea that there was something in the suggestion. The underlying theory, of course, is that otherwise normal deaf people, denied the usual means of communication with hearing and speaking people, acquire a special fluency and sharpness of pantomime in their efforts to make themselves understood and to show their feelings.

But, before he did anything about it, Mr. Spearing went to Universal City and spent nearly four years there, during which he was too busy writing scenarios, editing pictures and directing to devote any time to working out the theory. Last Summer, however, before coming East to take his present position in the editing and titling department of the Paramount studio in Long Island City, he made some preliminary investigations that encouraged him to put his idea to a test. In Mrs. Bertha Lincoln Heustis he found a sympathetic backer and in Gabriel Ravenelle, a teacher of stage pantomime who already had several deaf-mutes in his classes, he found an associate ready to work with him in training a cast for the camera.

Mr. Spearing then undertook the direction of the comedy. It is an unpretentious work, but in the opinion of many it substantiates the theory that there is a place for deaf-mutes on the screen. Also, the quick interest of those who have heard of the production indicates that a popular response to their work may be expected. Mr. Spearing also reports that he found the deaf people stimulating to work with. Communication with them is said to have been somewhat difficult and demanded patience from all concerned, but the players, none of whom had ever faced a motion-picture camera before, showed such eagerness and aptitude that he found it a pleasure to direct them.

The comedy is not hilarious, being merely a simple little story played in natural pantomime. The naturalness of the acting is evidenced by the fact that no one who has seen the picture without knowing in advance that the players were deaf-mutes had divined the fact.

As a CONNOISSEUR of COMPLEXIONS

By HELENA RUBINSTEIN
World Renowned Beauty Specialist

AS a connoisseur of complexions—as a life long student of scientific skin care I have found that the tendency of womankind to try out recklessly ever varying brands of creams—lotions—packs, and then on top of all a mixture of unrelated cosmetics—is the cause of a large portion of facial ills.

Each Valaze Beauty Preparation, although highly individualized in its effects, is scientifically harmonized in its relation to the others. Of them all, Valaze Pasteurized Face Cream, the basis of beauty, is best suited to skins of every type, age and condition. In itself an almost universal beautifier—when used in conjunction with the other needed Valaze Preparations it quickens and intensifies their specific effects.

THE BASIS OF BEAUTY

VALAZE PASTEURIZED FACE CREAM thoroughly removes grime and make-up—revitalizes cells and tissues—molds out that "tired look"—coaxes out all impurities—keeps the complexion smooth, protected, healthy. Unsurpassed for normal skins, this cream is unique in benefiting oily or acne-blemished skins. Excellent, also, as a foundation for make-up. (4 oz. 1.00, ½ lb. 2.00, lb. 3.50)

VALAZE CLEANSING AND MASSAGE CREAM—particularly recommended for dry, sensitive skins, alternating it with the Pasteurized Cream every other night—ideal for quick removal of dust and make-up. (75c, 1.25)

For greatest skin perfection VALAZE BEAUTIFYING SKIN FOOD—apply, after cleansing with either of the above creams. Lightens the skin, gradually bleaching away sallowness and tan. Refines the texture, creating an alluring delicacy. (1.00, 2.50.)

Whenever you feel fatigued VALAZE SKIN-TONING LOTION—pat this bracing beauty lotion all over the face. This refreshes, cleanses the skin, and tones up the tissues, helping to prevent flabbiness, to obliterate signs of age and keep pores invisible.

Safety first—in cosmetics For unexcelled flattering touches of beauty, absolutely free from harmful coverers, use the exquisite Valaze powders, rouges, lipsticks, mascara and other make-up preparations scientifically compounded by Helena Rubinstein.

Individual Beauty Service You are invited to visit the trained counsellors at Helena Rubinstein Salons—for an expert diagnosis of your individual beauty needs. Advice in signs on the correction of open pores, sluggish, drooping skin, blackheads and all facial blemishes.

GLEANINGS FROM THE SCREEN

LIEUT. COMMANDER RICHARD E. BYRD, U. S. N., will tell of his flight to the North Pole at the Times Square Theatre this evening. His lecture is entitled "The First North Pole Flight," and will be illustrated with moving and still pictures.

The 156th birthday anniversary of Ludwig Van Beethoven is being commemorated at the Paramount Theatre this week. The Paramount orchestra, with Irving Talbot conducting, will render a prelude to a film entitled, "Ludwig Van Beethoven," depicting the inspiration for the composer's famous "Moonlight Sonata."

Marshall Neilan has engaged Antonio Moreno to play the leading rôle opposite Constance Talmadge in "Carlotta," a Joseph M. Schenck production.

The Fifth Avenue Playhouse has adopted the policy of a weekly change of program. This week at this little theatre is a German production now known as "Chained." It has hitherto been known as "The Invert" and "Michael." It is based on Hermann Bang's novel, "Michael," which is concerned with the life of Rodin. The program will include Harold Lloyd in "Bumping Into Broadway," an old comedy, and "The Great Gulch Mystery," produced specially for the Fifth Avenue Playhouse.

Harry Langdon's latest two-reel Mack Sennett comedy, "There He Goes," is a novelty at the Mark Strand Theatre this week. It will be presented in addition to the feature picture, "The Girl from Coney Island."

Norma Talmadge is working in a modern version of "Camille," which is being directed by Fred Niblo. It is the intention to make this production one of the outstanding triumphs of Miss Talmadge's career, and therefore the cast is said to have been selected with great care. Gilbert Roland will portray Armand, Lillian Tashman will figure as Olympe, Rose Dione as Prudence and Oscar Beregi as Count de Varville.

The International Film Arts Guild is offering at the Cameo a varied program, the feature of which is "The Gorilla Hunt," a record of the adventures in Africa of Ben Burbridge, the well known Florida hunter. On the same program is a revival of "Old Bill," as Anatole France's "Crainquebille" in film form was called. The comedy will be Chaplin's "Dough and Dynamite."

PICTURES FROM THREE COUNTRIES

"Old Ironsides" Triumphs With Patriotic Appeal and Clever Comedy—Film Version of "Faust" a Marvel of Beauty

By MORDAUNT HALL.

THREE motion pictures of unusual merit were presented on Broadway last week. They hailed from America, Germany and Russia and served to demonstrate the wide scope and potentialities of the screen. The first was "Old Ironsides," written by Laurence Stallings and directed by James Cruze; the second was F. W. Murnau's pictorial version of "Faust," and the third was the Soviet film, "The Armored Cruiser Potemkin," produced by S. M. Eisenstein. They are as different as an apple, a rose and a thistle.

"The Armored Cruiser Potemkin" is a picture more out of the beaten path than even "Faust" or "Old Ironsides." It is a comparatively short film, dealing with the unique subject of a mutiny aboard a warship. It has met with unstinted praise from Max Reinhardt, the German producer; Douglas Fairbanks and Emil Jannings, the celebrated German actor. They declare it to be the finest motion picture ever made. Whether it actually deserves such panegyrics is a matter of opinion, but it at least can boast of being a film produced with a wonderful conception of cinematics. Mr. Eisenstein, in this production, moves from poetic ideas to harsh, throbbing notes, and in most instances his drama is convincing. Here and there he errs, being obviously always too eager to create sympathy for his heroes, and when he tries to stir up hatred he uses the sledgehammer. The Russian Government cooperated with him by putting warships at his disposal. He did not have to worry about the commercial possibilities of this effort. Apparently all that was needed was to have the film tell with bitterness the story of the mutiny on Black Monday, June 13, 1905 (the date according to the Russian calendar).

Mr. Eisenstein, however, does reveal a keen imagination, whether it is in picturing the mist on the water soon after daybreak, the speed of a warship, the brewing discontent of the sailors, the fear of the Odessa populace as they flee from the Cossacks or the sight of the crew as they hurl their officers into the sea.

The Censor's Cuts.

This picture opens with the sea crashing on a breakwater, and soon afterward one is confronted with views aboard the Potemkin and the ominous scowling of the men, who object to the bad meat. A close-up of the squirming maggots in the meat was deleted by the censor, who also eliminated scenes of a dead boy and one in which blood was pictured on a woman's gown. These cuts have not spoiled the production.

The principal parts in this film are enacted by members of the Moscow Art Theatre. These rôles are merely those of the ringleader of the mutiny, the ship's surgeon, a petty officer and other officers, including the commander of the vessel. None of them is given undue prominence and most of these characters are killed off when the mutineers wreak their vengeance.

One of the sequences that shows Mr. Eisenstein as a master of his craft is where the Potemkin anchors off Odessa. This section of the film is emphatically inspiring, for one perceives the dull-gray dawn, the haze hanging over the masts of fishing smacks and other vessels, the city slumbering without the sign of a soul. Then the day grows, objects become more distinct and people on land are beheld going about their daily toil. Another effective stretch is where, after the Odessa people have learned of the mutiny, they decide to lend what aid they can to the cruiser. Provisions and coal are carried out in boats of small craft. The scenes of the throng on land, especially when they run down the imposing flights of stone steps, are impressive, as is also the sight of hundreds of people standing the full length of the breakwater.

Vibrant Strokes.

In most of the chapters Mr. Eisenstein has introduced into this effort remarkable rhythm, especially when the battleship is under way. He puts in some vibrant strokes when he swings from the engine-room dials, to the decks, the ammunition hoists, the great gray guns—which incidentally are turned on their target. But he goes too far when he has the crew of the Potemkin fire on Odessa, for apparently these men did not take into consideration that for one Cossack they killed they might slaughter a dozen of their sympathizers.

Not the least interesting of the dramatic episodes is that in which the Cossacks are depicted marching in rows down the great flights of steps, firing point blank at the mob, never hesitating for a dead body, but merely lifting their feet over the prostrate figures. It is here that Mr. Eisenstein introduces a mother wheeling her baby in a perambulator. She is the victim of a Cossack bullet, and when she falls there is a second of suspense as the baby carriage with the child hesitates before rolling down the steps. Then it is shown gathering speed as it crashes along in its descent to the waterfront.

There are other stirring chapters aboard the Potemkin, when the lookout espies the other Russian warships. The sailors are asleep in various nooks and corners of the vessel, some indulging their fancy by slumbering in the officers' quarters. In an early sequence, prior to the mutiny, the crew is shown in their hammocks, one of them receiving a slash over the shoulders from a petty officer because he was blocking the gangway. Hence the later scenes of the men asleep impress one with the sailors' dislike for the foc'sle hammocks.

There are some truly brilliant flashes of machinery and water, and one "shot," disclosing the big guns with the sea below, is superb.

It would be very interesting to see what Mr. Eisenstein could do with a less prejudiced subject, one wherein he did not have to rake up a mutiny of more than twenty years ago to inspire him.

The Gallant Constitution.

JAMES CRUZE'S vastly entertaining picture, "Old Ironsides," triumphed at its première last Monday evening in the Rivoli Theatre. It is a mixture of vigorous comedy, hokumized romance and eloquent sea scenes. It unfolds the great story of the gallant Constitution in an absorbing fashion and despite the introduction of a romantic bark, called the Esther, one is never annoyed by the intrusions of a love affair between the Girl and the Boy, even though Esther Ralston, who plays the feminine lead of the story, delights her fancy by wearing semi-décolleté gowns in a half gale. Kisses are exchanged according to the whims of these lovers, and on one occasion the boy is standing on the shoulders of one of the three men to whom he is shackled. When these other men tire of his lengthy adieu, they pull him down, and the four friends splash over into the water, off Tripoli. It matters not, however, for they climb into a boat and row out to the open sea on the off chance of meeting a vessel. And, fortunately, they are picked up by the Constitution. The girl at that time is a prisoner aboard the Esther, which had been captured by the pirates.

There are some glorious scenes aboard the vessel—a clever reproduction of the Constitution—and Mr. Cruze has turned his lens from many angles upon the decks and the rigging. There are scenes in this production that are far and away the most impressive of any film seascapes, and for the first time on the screen one actually sees a ship on the open sea, in the midst of whitecaps.

A startling feature of the evening and one that is being continued at this theatre is the enlarging of the screen. Just before the finish of the first half of the picture the Constitution is shown in a great close-up. This is done through what is called a magnascope, a device something on the order of a magnifying lens, which is attached to the projection machine. Before this novelty was introduced the picture had been unfurled on a screen about 12 by 18 feet, and some idea of the effect it had upon the audience can be gathered when it is said that the larger screen is 30 by 40 feet. It proved so stirring to the spectators that every man and woman in the theatre rose to their feet and applauded while Dr. Hugo Riesenfeld's orchestra and a choir rendered "Ship of State."

In "Old Ironsides" there are three men who fill the comedy rôles. Two of them are well known for portrayals of villains—Wallace Beery and George Bancroft. The third is George Godfre who impersonates the negro cook aboard the Esther. He is particularly superstitious about having women on any ship on which he sails, and to counteract the possibility of bad luck he has a habit of spitting through his crossed fingers, an action which made the audience roar with laughter.

The fighting scenes, wherein the Constitution wipes out the Tripolitan forts, and the episode in which young Decatur goes forth with a small craft to blow up the Philadelphia, which had been captured by the Barbary Coast pirates, are sterling contributions to this thoroughly enjoyable and inspiring entertainment.

Wallace Beery, with a wig, ragged clothes and earrings, is a valuable asset to this picture. Sharing honors with him is Mr. Bancroft, who it will be remembered stole all the thunder in Mr. Cruze's production, "The Pony Express." Mr. Bancroft here is seen as the master gunner of the Constitution who is absent without leave. He is shanghaied aboard the Esther by none other than Beery, the bo'sn, who, although he stands in abject fear of the gunner, is sufficiently crafty to get the bigger man to fill himself up with grog.

Miss Ralston, whose glossy, wellwaved fair hair is never disturbed by any wind, is charming as the Girl, and Charles Farrell is a very earnest and appealing young hero.

Murnau's New Film.

FOR sheer beauty perhaps no picture has ever rivaled F. W. Murnau's picturization of "Faust." This film, which has been held over at the Capitol for a second week, is an artistic achievement in which there is no catering to commercial angles. It is something which Mr. Murnau, the producer of "The Last Laugh," unfurls in a poetic mood, and he is ably assisted by Emil Jannings as Mephisto and Camilla Horn as Marguerite. Those who were supercilious regarding casting Mr. Jannings in the role of the Devil will be agreeably disappointed, for after watching this German actor's impersonation one comes to the conclusion that it is not always necessary to have a slender Satan. Mr. Jannings makes his Mephisto sufficiently diabolical, sly, ever gloating over the traps he sets for his victims, sometimes winking with delight over the evil he accomplishes, and even turning his hand to go through the motions of shaking up a poisonous cocktail after declaring himself opposed to alcohol.

Lighting and shadows have never been used to better advantage than they are in this picture. Here one perceives an image receiving the full benefit of the light while the figures in the background are deftly shaded; then one is confronted with symbolic touches, such as Satan's monster wings closing like a great thundercloud over a town. There are marvelous photographic effects before Faust succumbs to the Devil's temptation and becomes a young man. And then there is Aunt Martha, capitally played by Yvette Guilbert, who finds the Devil a most ingratiating person. She pursues him, and while he delights in beguiling her, he is not in the least interested in her matronly presence. After Marguerite picks the petals from a blossom, wondering whether Faust "loves her or loves her not," the Devil takes a sunflower and taunts Martha by pulling out the seeds, and as he does so saying, "She loves me, she loves me not."

The closing note of this production, in which it is set forth that the only thing worth while in the world is "love," is pictured in an unforgettable fashion, with splashes of fire upon the screen something reminiscent of the cleverest portion of Cecil B. De Mille's film "The Ten Commandments." In the end these thistles of flame join suddenly into making the word "Love."

WOODROW WILSON FILM MEMORIAL

THE Woodrow Wilson Film Memorial, a six-reel biography of the late President of the United States, is to be presented at Town Hall, 123 West Forty-third Street, tomorrow evening. The showing has been arranged by a special committee of which Mrs. Charles L. Tiffany is Chairman and which includes Norman H. Davis, Mrs. Charles Dana Gibson, Frank L. Polk, Miss Virginia Potter, Rabbi Stephen S. Wise and Mrs. Otto Wittpenn, acting under the auspices of the Woodrow Wilson Memorial Society.

The Wilson Film Memorial is an historic document, being a compilation of motion pictures taken of Woodrow Wilson during his life, including his two inaugurations, incidents in the White House, his activities during the war and at the Peace Conference, his return to the United States, his final illness and the tributes paid to him by the world at the time of his death. The film was made by the Memorial Society with the object of "keeping Woodrow Wilson forever alive among his people." There are no fictitious scenes in the production.

The closing date of "Ben-Hur" at the Embassy, previously announced as Dec. 22, has been changed to Sunday, Dec. 19.

PRIMITIVE AMERICA ON SCREEN

Two Women Follow Daniel Boone's Trails in Kentucky Hills and Film Scenes in the Life of Strange People

LIFE in what is still "primitive America" is depicted in a film recently made by Mrs. Newton Perkins and Miss Sophie K. Smith with the purpose of helping the work carried on by the Demonstration Centre at Wendover, Ky., in behalf of mothers and children in the mountains. Mrs. Mary Breckinridge has charge of the Demonstration Centre. The film is called, "On the Trail of the Pioneer," and was made in Leslie County.

One day last April, when the first hint of Spring was in the air, Mrs. Perkins and Miss Smith left New York for the Kentucky hills. A few miles beyond Lexington the railroad ends in the little town of Hazzard, which is no more than a few stores and a group of miners' shacks around the mouth of the mine and the station. Here the two women connected with the mail wagon, which took them on to Hyden, the county seat, twenty-seven miles further from civilization.

The little town of Hyden has a main street which is neither lighted nor paved. It has many hitching posts along its muddy length, for in these parts the horse is still the only means of travel. It is said that a motor car has never ventured through those mountain roads. The bank, the general store and the post office are the three bulwarks of its existence, and the mail wagons, the system of communication with the outside world, reach the village twice a week, weather permitting. The only other vehicle used on the roads is a sort of wooden sled. It is drawn by a horse or a mule, the driver standing on a step at the rear. All produce from the neighboring farms is thus brought into Hyden for barter, because money is seldom used by the natives.

Many Boys Named Pearl.

When Mrs. Perkins and Miss Smith reached Hyden they found that the way had been prepared for them by Mrs. Breckinridge, who had called a meeting of leading citizens and obtained permission to take motion pictures. The next step was to find a boy who could ride the pack horse, which was to carry three cameras, cooking utensils and sleeping kit. A youth of 16 named "Pearl," a name frequently used for boys down there, was chosen for the trip because he knew the mountain trails within a five-mile radius of Hyden and was described as a good woodsman. Then the party started on the journey. It occupied twenty-one days, traveling at an average rate of twenty-five miles a day up mountains, through primeval woods, across streams—following the very trails that Daniel Boone marked out 175 years ago when he went out as a pioneer with neither horse nor dog to keep him company.

Except for a few days at the Demonstration Centre, the women spent all their time in the open, taking pictures of the natives as they went about their daily toil. They cooked their own meals, groomed their own horses. Each night when the weather was fit they rolled up in sleeping bags out-of-doors; at other times they found quarters in the nearest farmhouse. Everywhere they found hospitable welcome, and frequently discovered that they were not the only guests who had sought shelter for the night.

A Call on Sergeant Sandling.

At one house two visiting clergymen arrived on the same night and also a distant cousin of the family, so that, instead of the usual group of three, nine persons gathered around the table that night. No pretense at killing the fatted calf was made, however, and the usual evening meal of thick corn bread, a bowl of comb honey and a pot of coffee was the menu.

These farmhouses usually contain two or three rooms; one large room is used for all the family activities; one or two serve as sleeping rooms. Many of the poorer cabins have no windows and are lighted at night by either candles or small lanterns. All water is brought in from a well and, needless to say, as little is used as possible.

In a small cabin on a lonely hillside the photographers found the wife and two children of Sergeant Sandling, who won honor in the American Army during the World War. When asked where he was, his wife pointed to a tiny figure far up the mountain. "He's sowing corn," she said, "and won't be down until tomorrow." The children had the sergeant's decorations as toys. When he was pressed to talk of his war services he spoke deprecatingly, as if it were all part of the day's work. His chief interest was his corn.

The photographers found these mountain people shy of having their pictures taken. They had never seen a moving picture and few had even heard of such a thing. Most of the older women smoked pipes incessantly yet showed evident disapproval of cigarettes. The men occupy themselves chiefly with raising enough produce for their own wants and for exchange for other commodities. The only form of industry is logging.

Money Lies in Bank.

This wood cutting is done in a haphazard, unscientific way, so that whole mountainsides have been shorn of every vestige of growth. In the Spring mahogany, maple and pine trees are cut, rolled down the hillside to the river, made into rafts and floated to Lexington. The money obtained for these logs finds its way into the bank at Hyden and is practically the only money in the community.

While the photographers were staying at Wendover with Mrs. Breckinridge and her eight nurses, they visited a tiny cabin called "Eagle's Nest." It nestled in a dip on the top of a high hill; the trail was so indistinct that the only way to gain the top was to give the horse his head and leave the pathfinding to him. Up there they found a girl-wife of 15 years living with her baby and her old father. The latter raised corn on a stony patch of ground. A nurse went up that hillside alone the night the baby was born. It was 10 o'clock of a snowy night in February when she started and past midnight when she arrived, her only light a small saddle lantern.

Until these nurses began their work among the people of Leslie County the infant mortality had been higher here than anywhere else in the world. This was due not to any inherited disease—for the people are sturdy, wholesome and clean-living—but because of not knowing how to care for their babies.

The Demonstration Centre holds a clinic once a week, and here they instruct the mothers and give them the benefit of their scientific studies in baby raising. This clinic day has become a sort of market day also. All sorts of produce and preserves, handiwork and live stock are brought in and exchanged for other commodities that the mothers want. It is the nearest thing these women have to a mothers' club. The nurses are ever ready to go to their homes when the call comes for help, and in this way civilization is reaching out its hands to the isolated people of Daniel Boone's country.

One of the Vitaphone features at Warners' Theatre has proved interesting to lovers of Wagnerian music. It is "Tannhäuser," the opening number of the program, played by the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, under the direction of Henry Hadley. Over 200 consecutive performances of this Wagnerian overture have been given in this theatre, and this is said to constitute a record for the overture in this country.

PROJECTION JOTTINGS

CAMERA work on Gloria Swanson's first picture for the United Artists is almost finished. This production is called "Sunya," and Miss Swanson and her director, Albert Parker, expect soon to begin the cutting and titling of the production.

An interesting supporting cast was assembled for this film. It includes Andreas de Segurola, the opera singer; John Boles, a musical comedy actor; Ian Keith, Hugh Miller, Anders Randolf, Ivan Lebedeff, John Miltern, Raymond Hackett, Forest Huff, another opera singer; Pauline Garon; Flobelle Fairbanks, a niece of Douglas Fairbanks, and Robert Schable, who also officiates as production manager.

Hugo Ballin provided numerous realistic settings for "Sunya," the story of which was written for the screen by Earle Browne. It is based on Max Marcin's play, "Eyes of Youth."

Photography of this film began on Sept. 20. "Sunya," incidentally, is a Sanscrit word meaning illusion in the sense that all life here is phantom-like. Sunya is the name of the character Miss Swanson impersonates.

Sunya is a modern young girl faced with giving up her sweetheart to save her family from financial ruin. She has three choices: One is marriage to a millionaire, a second is the chance of an operatic career and the third is to remain at home and support her family by teaching. As Sunya despairingly tries to reach a decision a Yogi appears on the scene and shows her within a crystal all that will happen on the three paths if she follows them.

The story gives Miss Swanson five characterizations. She is the incarnation of an Egyptian girl centuries ago. She is a young American girl sought by the Yogi to atone for a great sin committed against her in past incarnations. She is the temperamental opera singer, whose conduct even shocks Paris. She is the wife of a millionaire, and lastly the prematurely aged school teacher fighting to support her family.

Rin-Tin-Tin in "While London Sleeps" is the principal pictorial number at the Broadway.

Donald Hall, baritone with the original "Floradora" company and a former member of the famous George Edwards Gaiety Company of London, has been added to the cast of W. C. Fields's picture, "The Potters." Mr. Hall was once leading man with Anna Held and Fritzi Scheff.

Sidney Jarvis, a character actor, has been engaged for the rôle of the manager of a baseball team in "Casey at the Bat," in which Wallace Beery is featured.

The women's side of the World War is the theme of "Corporal Kate," the next feature picture at the Hippodrome. In it Vera Reynolds, Julia Faye and Kenneth Thomson figure in the principal parts.

"Stranded in Paris" is the chief film attraction at the Paramount. Bebe Daniels is featured in this subject. Others in the cast are James Hall, Ford Sterling and Iris Stuart. The story was adapted from a play called "Jenny's Escapade."

"The Fire Brigade," a Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer production, is to open at the Central Theatre on Dec. 20. "Tell It to the Marines," in which Lon Chaney is featured, will be presented at the Embassy Dec. 23.

NEWS AND COMMENT OF THE CURRENT WEEK IN MUSIC

ORCHESTRAL STANDARDS

Gabrilowitsch and Band He Is Shaping—Criticism Versus Radio in England

By OLIN DOWNES.

THOSE who listen to orchestras frequently or have actively to do with them realize the extraordinary fidelity and responsiveness of any orchestra to the musical personality of the leader. This does not refer to the leader's practical control of the players so much as it does to the inner correspondence of his musical temperament with the more subtle characteristics of the playing and the very tone-quality of the orchestra.

A case in point is the concert given last Tuesday night by the visiting symphony orchestra of Detroit, with Mr. Gabrilowitsch, practically the creator of the orchestra as it now stands, as its leader. The orchestra itself has some excellent material in it, and some of second-rate quality. It has not quite the number of players that most of the great orchestras of this country now boast, although the orchestra is adequate to the demands of the modern as well as the classic repertory. Mr. Gabrilowitsch has, therefore, his special problems to meet. He has been meeting them now for eight years, and the results already manifest indicate a quality of orchestral performance in the making which is becoming unfortunately rare today.

The correspondence between Mr. Gabrilowitsch's characteristics as a pianist and the expression of the same tendencies in his conducting is striking. As a pianist he has been rarely distinguished by the balance, beauty and poetic feeling in his art. He combines a classic continence of style with romantic impulse, and, on occasion, virtuoso fire. Perhaps he turns his face away from certain contemporaneous tendencies in music, feeling that these particular tendencies, such as hyper-emotionalism, sensational effects, distorted proportions, are contrary to the spirit of great music. In so doing he may ignore developments that work toward a richer musical language and a more intensive expression of certain phases of feeling, but he retains what is being so generally lost—the sanity, breadth and nobility of manner which characterized so much of the older musical art, and the fineness of proportion, the clearness of color, of other days. Admitting that musicians or reviewers of the more radical persuasion might find themselves divergent from Mr. Gabrilowitsch on some of these points, he has the advantage of the great majority of them in the actual beauty and significance of his work, and his ideals promise exceptionally well for the future of his orchestra.

In that orchestra there are today inevitable roughnesses, and, as is usual in young symphonic orchestras, the prevailing quality of the string choir is superior, collectively speaking, to that of the choirs of wood and brass. But the orchestral tone is already assuming a quality that reminds one distantly of the glories of the old Boston Symphony during the period, say, from the year 1900 to the arrival of Karl Muck. We are thinking of the tone of the Boston Symphony under Wilhelm Gericke. It is a more modern instrument today. Mr. Koussevitsky reflects the ideas of modern colorists. Muck made the orchestra a little less sensuous and refined, a little more incisive and dramatic in its tone and accent than Gericke. Gericke was a conductor and a musician of highly conservative persuasions, but, as is well known, a superb drill master with an ear the like of which has seldom been known, of a born Viennese for orchestral quality. His brass choir was probably the smoothest if also the most discreet in the memory of man. Its fullness and richness in those comparatively rare moments when Mr. Gericke allowed it to assume all of its power, its soft and subdued radiance when it blended, "piano," with the other instruments, is a thing that haunts the memory. The wind choir had the marvelous French players, in their prime, whose solo performances in such music as the slow movement of the Schubert C major symphony were beyond praise. They, indeed, were music itself, and pity is that Schubert never heard them. But the final glory of the orchestra was its strings, which had a glow and a shimmer, a texture that probably no string choir in America has had before or since. We are guilty of reminiscence, which is the worst of crimes in these swift days; the matter that called out all this was the thought of the euphony, the refinement, the balance and the texture of Gericke's orchestral tone, and the fact that Mr. Gabrilowitsch, with material that is considerably inferior to Gericke's in his hands, and with an orchestra younger and much cruder than the Boston Symphony in 1900, appears to be working toward the same euphonious ideals. His colors are cooler, his balances more scrupulous and less preponderant of brass, percussion, or the shriller effects of the wood, than those of almost any contemporary conductor. He eschews the very fast tempo or the exaggerated emergence of this or that tone-tint for the sake of an arresting effect. The power of the strings is not usurped; their body of tone is the criterion, so to speak, of the quality of the band. It is an older ideal of orchestral music, and a very fine and high one, that Mr. Gabrilowitsch projects. His ultimate standard for his orchestra is far ahead of him. Some will disagree with aspects of his interpretations of last Tuesday. This last is not very important. Mr. Gabrilowitsch as a musician having an extremely good right to his own ideas, and never cheapening himself or his art in working them out. The interesting point is the return to orchestral principles that are opposed to the prevailing sensationalism of this time, and a fine orchestra in the making. Mr. Gabrilowitsch's work in Detroit is a concentration of the gospel he had already spread as a pianist and a musician in many lands. It was good to feel the presence of his mind and spirit in the program he gave, good to realize that it is this kind of an artistic nature which is exerting a powerful influence in the westward musical development of the country.

It was darkly hinted in these columns a few weeks ago that the day might come when a music critic would refuse to go out of nights, when he would remain at home, secure from snow and sleet, and write his criticism of performances heard over the radio. Many a truth is spoken in jest. In England the criticism of concerts heard over the radio is no longer a fantasy or a joke, but a reality, yet a reality attended with artistic evils and the cause of complications. Ernest Newman discusses the new situation in The London Sunday Times. He speaks first of the results of faulty radio transmission, and of the knowledge of the critic in conflict with the ignorance of the vast new-made audiences for symphonic music which the British Broadcasting Company has developed. These new audiences hear symphonic compositions for the first time. They appear to like them, which is good. But they, in common with most of their receiving sets, are in an elementary stage so far as good music is concerned. One result of their enthusiasm is resentment of the reservations expressed by Mr. Newman and some of his colleagues about the quality of the music as it comes over the air, and such deficiencies as there may be in the performances.

The British Broadcasting Company now installs receiving sets in the critics' homes to facilitate their reviews of its concerts. Such reviews, written, when they do not conflict with important concerts in the writer's vicinity, by critics of standing in England, have proved rather unsatisfactory to every one concerned. A performance may sound well in one district and poorly in another; one receiving set is different from or better than another; and the groundlings in good music are certain, as groundlings are likely to be, that their new-found knowledge is superior to the judgment of men who have been studying the subject for their lifetime.

Mr. Newman is not illogically distrustful of the value of the criticism of radio concerts under these circumstances. "We critics are assured every now and then that the transmission of this or that orchestral concert has been 'perfect.' On the strength of this assertion we listen in for ourselves and find that it is not perfect. For many reasons it is desirable that we musicians should be told, on the authority of some one we can trust, precisely with what degree of accuracy complicated music can now be transmitted by wireless. The semi-musical listener-in is no concern of ours; he gets something that seemed to him just about as good as what he would get in the concert room, and if he is satisfied with it that is entirely his own affair. Why keep telling him that there are better vintages, when in the terms of the case these are not accessible to him and to multitudes like him? If he has heard of Scriabin, but lives in a town or a village where Scriabin's music has never been, and probably never will be, accessible to him at first hand, who will grudge him such pleasure as he can get from a radio version of the 'Poem of Ecstasy,' imperfect as that version may be? If he cannot get to the Riviera this Winter, but can get to Blackpool, why put him out of tune with Blackpool by an invidious comparison of the two places?"

This would appear to be the pith of the radio situation, so far as the critic is concerned today. A changing world, one in which artistic values are likely to suffer further uncertainty and confusion!

MUSIC PERFORMED OR PROJECTED IN EUROPE

Colles on Sibelius's Sixth Symphony—Opera in the Continental Theatres

SIBELIUS'S Sixth Symphony, in D minor, was directed for the first time in England by Sir Henry Wood at a Queen's Hall concert on Nov. 21. Mr. Colles of The London Times said: "It is not at all an arresting work; it is absolutely free of that sort of magniloquence of orchestral speech which belongs to all the popular specimens of the late nineteenth century symphony, from Tchaikovsky to Elgar. Indeed, the only other symphonic composer with whom the Sixth Symphony of Sibelius might be compared is Vaughan Williams, whose 'Pastoral' Symphony' and whose suite 'Flos Campi' exhibit something of the same aloof and abstracted attitude of mind. The previous work of Sibelius which seems to prepare the way of this one is the Fourth Symphony, in A minor, which Sir Henry Wood has given us more than once in the past, and will, we hope, give us again with this one in the near future.

"The Sixth Symphony is in four short movements of subtle and intricate design, distinguished from the classical type by the fact that it is not so much the initial appearances of themes which make a series of impressions as their confluence, which fascinates the hearer. There is practically no recapitulation of ideas in any one of the four, and, therefore, no cooling off of interest. At a first hearing every one of the movements seems too short, because the music is developed up to a point of intensity (not a tonal climax) and stops abruptly when that point has been reached. Whether that is a virtue or a defect is scarcely to be decided offhand; the form, however, is framed to the exact measure of the composer's thought. The style of writing is transparently clear. From the quiet polyphonic texture of the passage for strings, with which it opens, to the quick rhythmic dialogues between several groups of instruments by which the finale is carried forward, there is not a progression which can either confuse or afflict the sensitive ear, and yet the music never falls into tameness or insipidity. There is no suggestion of a program, and very little to prompt the use of that overworked word 'emotion.' The several movements are not, so far as we could detect, connected thematically, yet they do produce a sense of unity, of belonging to one another as parts of a single sequence of musical thought. Moreover, the symphony has (again like Vaughan Williams's 'Pastoral') what may be called a color of its own. It may be likened to looking at the reflections of the trees in clear and deep water, reflections which are disturbed and beautified by the surface movements of the water. The inverted feeling which prompts the analogy is partly due to a technical characteristic which has been noted before in Sibelius's music, his way of, as it were, suspending his harmonies from his melody instead of making the melody depend on a bass.

"The contrast of method could scarcely have been more sharply pointed than by placing the symphony among the German classics, as was done in this concert. Brahms's 'Academic Festival Overture,' the last piece in the program, is a supreme instance of the basic method of contrapuntal writing, the feet firmly planted on solid ground. After a careful, if not impeccable, reading of the new symphony, and a sympathetic backing to Mme. Suggia in the concerto, Sir Henry Wood and the orchestra gave one of the finest performances we have ever heard of Brahms's overture, one in which exactly the right time was allowed for each eloquent phrase, and the whole moved inevitably to its climax."

The D'Oyly Carte season of Gilbert and Sullivan opera at the Prince's Theatre closes Dec. 18 with the first act of "Iolanthe" and the second act of "The Yeomen of the Guard." The company will pay a visit to the principal cities in Canada, opening at His Majesty's Theatre, Montreal, early in the new year. Although the D'Oyly Carte Opera Company has previously visited America and Africa, in addition to the principal cities in Germany, Holland, Austria and Bavaria, this will be the first visit to Canada.

The Carnegie United Kingdom Trust has announced Dec. 21 as the closing date for sending in works for the 1927 adjudication. In addition to the usual forms, music written for the films is now eligible, as well as overtures or suites written for military bands.

Opera at Monte Carlo.

RAOUL GUNSBOURG, director of the Monte Carlo Opera, will present the following works during a season which will extend from Jan. 25 to Feb. 7, 1927: "Turandot" (Puccini), "Oberon" (Weber centenary), "Rosenkavalier," "Parsifal," "Damnation de Faust," "Walküre," "Boris Godunoff," "Samson et Dalila," "Thaïs," "Hérodiade," "Otello," "Traviata," "Madama Butterfly," "Tosca," "Lakmé," "Fay-Yen-Fah" (Messrs. Crocker and Redding), "Tales of Hoffmann," "Ivan the Terrible" (Raoul Gunsbourg) and "Meistersinger." The conductors will be Léon Jehin and Victor de Sabata. Mme. Poolman, the wife of the director of the Dutch Co-opera-tie Company, will open the season in "Samson et Dalila." A statue of Saint-Saëns, which is standing between those of Berlioz and Massenet, will be unveiled at the Monte Carlo Opera.

The Serge de Diaghileff Russian Ballet will give a season at the Monte Carlo Opera next April and May. It will introduce the English pantomime, "The Triumph of Neptune," which was first given in London, in November, and for which Lord Berners wrote the music. In its repertory will be found Stravinsky's "Nightingale," "Petruschka," "Fire-Bird," "Pulcinella," Erik Satie's "Jack-in-the-Box," George Auric's "Pastorale," Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Sadko," "Les Fâcheux," "Romeo and Juliet," "Barabau," "L'Après-midi d'un Faune," "Les Matelots," "Zéphire et Flore," "Les Biches," "Contes Russes," &c. M. René Blum will include in his season of musical comedies, which closes Jan. 24, "Qui êtes-vous?" (creation), music by Charles Cuvilliers; "Chouconne" (creation), music by F. Ochs; "La Marquise de Carabas" (creation), music b, Gabriel Grovlez; "Le Marchant de Lunettes" (creation), music by Marcel Dalaunoy; "L'Arlésienne," "Le Médecin malgré lui," &c.

Messrs. Alfano, de Sabata, Lualdi, Michetti, Pizzetti, Prutella, Toni and Zandonai have presented a memorial to the Duce Mussolini on the present opera crisis in Italy. Verdi was 26 when his first opera was produced, so was Rossini, but no composer of the present day can hope to see a piece performed until he has passed his youthful prime.

Mme. Luisa Tetrazzini (Signora Vernati) has turned her attention to concert singing.

Musical Events in Central Europe

PAUL HINDEMITH'S new opera, "Cardillac," was given its first performance at the Dresden Opera House Nov. 9. Fritz Busch directed. Issai Dobrowen was responsible for the mise en scène; Raffaelo Busoni, son of Ferruccio Busoni, made the sketches for some of the scenery. Max Marschalk in the Vossische Zeitung remarked that "we live in a period of transition. The great talents of today seem thinner than those of yesteryear. Productions are fewer; most of them fail to survive a first night." The première of "Cardillac" attracted opera directors, conductors, musicians and critics from all parts of Germany. Their opinion was divided, but Mr. Marschalk thought that "Cardillac" would have a successful run in the German theatres. The hero of the opera is a goldsmith, who manufactures and sells his wares in his own shop. He is murdered by one of his customers from motives of greed.

The libretto, written by Ferdinand Lion, "did not seem suited to the music, or the music was not suited to the text," Mr. Marschalk could not decide which. "The story seemed weak, while the music went on and on." It gave the critic an impression of being constructed and not inspired. "The score shows ambition, ability, skill in linear counterpoint, but it is more mathematics than music. For long stretches it sounds like an exercise." Hindemith is spoken of in Germany as the Mozart of the present day. "One must take into account that the melody of the new era is quite different from the old. Can what Hindemith writes be called melody? Melodies are inspired, not constructed; they are individual, personal and not matter of fact. Has Hindemith written himself out?"

Eugen d'Albert's opera "Der Golem" was produced for the first time at the Frankfort Opera House Nov. 14. The libretto is by Ferdinand Lion. Karl Holl, in the Frankfurter Zeitung, remarked that this Golem of 1926 was quite a different type from the old Hebrew of the ancient legends. "He is an opera hero and has to behave like one. He loves Lea, the foster-daughter of the rabbi, to her undoing." These are the three principal figures. The secondary characters include a youth who loves Lea, Rudolph II, with his astronomer, Tycho Brahe, and types of Spanish Jews. Solomon and the Queen of Sheba make a momentary apparition. "The background is a mixture of the Kabbala, religion and mysticism. Eugen d'Albert uses a full instrumental palette and a great deal of tone color." It is the eighteenth opera of the 62-year-old composer, "heavier and more difficult than its predecessors. The score is brilliantly orchestrated." Clemens Kraus conducted.

Felix Weingartner, directing some guest performances at Budapest, came into collision with the director of the Budapest Theatre, Geza Sebestyen, on the choice of a singer, Mr. Sebestyen had promised the rôle of Micaela in "Carmen" to Therese Kosseghy, but Weingartner had already rehearsed the part with Fräulein Gizi Karman. The director was firm on his choice and Weingartner refused to direct the performance of "Carmen." Sebestyen considered this a breach of contract and informed the celebrated German conductor that his contract was void. The music director of the theatre, Desider Markus, continued the rehearsals.

"Tiefland" in the West.

LAST Thursday the Chicago première of Eugen d'Albert's opera "Tiefland" was given by the Chicago Civic Opera Company, with Claudia Muzio, Lorna Doone Jackson, Irene Pavloska, Helen Freund, Forrest Lamont, Giacomo Rimini and Alexander Kipnis; Weber conducted. The opera was sung in English. The two-thousandth performance of "Tiefland" was recently celebrated in Berlin, and the opera was chosen as the season's première for five of the leading opera houses in Austria and Germany, where it ranks in popularity with "Carmen." "Tiefland" has a Spanish setting and the plot is taken from Guimera's novel, "Marta of the Lowlands."

FOR MODERN PROGRAMS

To the Editor of The New York Times:

In answer to the letter attacking Mr. Mengelberg, I wish to call attention to the fact that Mr. Mengelberg is sufficiently progressive to want to play new compositions. It is easy enough for a conductor of Mr. Mengelberg's genius to rest upon his laurels and continue to play symphonies which he knows appeal to the public. Certainly Mr. Mengelberg is not performing novelties for his own glorification. He probably sees something in these works which future generations may feel more kindly disposed toward than we are. No genius was ever appreciated to the fullest extent in his own time. Hanslick, had he had sufficient power, would certainly have relegated Wagner to the musty shelves.

Which brings me to the performance of Mahler's Fifth. Despite the storm of protest, I cannot help but feel that Mahler is being unjustly treated by our critics, some of whom probably formed their opinions years and years ago. There seems to be sufficient inspiration in Mahler's Fifth—not Mahler's best by any means—to keep it from being forgotten. The Chorale, the opening pages, the poignant cry of grief in the first movement, the Adagietto, the use of the Chorale in the Rondo—these moments seem sufficient reward for the uninspired portions, or portions that seem uninspired because they are very likely not understood. The symphony as a whole ought to be studied. The mere fact that a work is long should not prejudice a reviewer. "Faust," "Paradise Lost," the Ninth of Beethoven, the "Eroica," the Missa Solemnis, Bach's B Minor Mass—these are all long, but their length does not detract from their greatness.

Mr. Mengelberg ought to be given a vote of thanks for performing Mahler. I hope that he will perform more works of this much misunderstood master. ROBERT G. GREY.

A COLLEGIATE OPINION.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

I have read with more or less amusement Mr. Morton Aaron Mayer's short criticism of my recent letter criticizing Mr. Mengelberg's insipid programs for the past two months or so. And I must kotow humbly to Mr. Mayer's profound discovery that I misused an English word. It is true. I had given a wrong meaning to "willy-nilly" and am willing to acknowledge my mistake. And yet. . . . I repeat emphatically that Stravinsky's Two Suites are puerile—and clumsy in their puerility. I repeat that Bloch's Israel Symphony is boring—and I say this although I have the greatest respect for Mr. Bloch's attempt to write Hebrew music, a fact which I emphasized in my recent article on Mr. Bloch for a periodical. I repeat that Sibelius's "Finlandia" is, for the most part, musically worthless. And to this I add that Beethoven's Eighth Symphony is trivial.

PRAISES OPERA COMIQUE

To the Editor of The New York Times:

Mr. Mason Terry's letter on the subject of English opera comique in today's TIMES does not tell the whole story about the French and German comic operas which we used to have, done in English in the olden days, before comic opera degenerated into musical comedy for want of librettists.

These English versions were wretched affairs, but they served the'r purpose in their day when audiences went to the operettas to hear music, vocal and orchestral, and were content with their beautiful music, in spite of the great loss of values in the adaptations. In their original productions, whether in German or French, the music was invariably set to lyrics, as in grand opera. Now when it comes to writing English lyrics to music already written one runs up against a thankless if not impossible job, in consequence of which the English adaptations were necessarily poor stuff, in lyrics and often in dialogue. I doubt very much whether Miss Donnelly or any of our lyric writers today could do any better at putting English words to "Girofié-Girofla," "Mascotte," "Madame Angot," any and all of them, than the lyric writers whose versions were used by the McCaull, Duff, Bostonians and other excellent opera companies of the '80s and '90s. Let them try it and see what a difficult task it is.

Foreign adaptations were all right, bad as they were, in the old days before the demand for the eye attractions set in—dancing, scenery and costumes as now seen in musical comedies. The demand for the eye attractions developed by the motion picture in the vast theatre-going public of today leaves people like Mr. Mason and myself in the company of a very small minority of old fogies to whom these bad old versions (adaptations) would still appeal, for I must say I too would like to hear the old Bostonians in "The Chimes of Normandy," "Mascotte," &c. But the performance which I saw of "La Mascotte" at the Jolson was infinitely better in French than any performance of any English company (I refer to the principals, lyrics, comedy and not to the chorus or the scenery, both of which were bad) ever gave or could have given of an adaptation.

I am one of those who believe that with very few exceptions grand opera and comic opera should be done in the language in which they were written. Our language seems to lend itself to this sort of thing less well than French, Italian or Russian.

Take almost any lyric in "Mascotte" and read it in the original, particularly the comedy numbers. To do them in English and come anywhere near the original in point of value is impossible.

FRENCH OPERETTAS.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

Last evening I had the pleasure of attending as fine a theatrical performance as could be asked for. I would suggest to all the young people (and older ones too) who think that they are actors to hie themselves to Jolson's Theatre and witness what accomplished actors can do. I am speaking of the French Opera Comique Company.

You don't have to know a word of the language to enjoy yourself as much as at any Broadway production. Their actions speak louder than words.

If you are at all interested in music, you will hear the very finest voices—tunes which you will always remember because they are better than anything you have ever heard—and as good as you will ever hear.

In a few words: If you like good, clever entertainment, by people who "know their oats," don't miss hearing the French company at Jolson's. You will, honestly, never regret it.

BOHEMIANS CELEBRATE

Twenty Years of Musical Good Fellowship Marked by Gala Testimonial

THE Bohemians celebrate three important anniversaries next Sunday evening. In the grand ballroom of the Commodore Hotel they will tender a banquet to Harold Bauer and Ossip Gabrilowitsch as a mark of appreciation for the latter's services to the cause of music in this country during the past twenty-five years. This season also marks the twentieth anniversary of the founding of The Bohemians. On this occasion there will be present some thousand guests, including the five hundred members of the club, distinguished musicians of a score of nations, their friends, patrons of the art and personages of the metropolitan music world.

Twenty years ago a small group of musicians gathered at Lüchow's, that gay gastronomical centre on Fourteenth Street, the scene of a thousand and one musical nights, to bid farewell to Moriz Rosenthal, about to sail for Europe after a concert tour. On that evening Rafael Joseffy, the pianist, outlined his project for a musicians' club radically different in character and aims from those then in existence. With Rubin Goldmark, August Fraemcke, Hugo Grunwald and Sigmund Herzog, Joseffy laid the foundations for the present organization. At the close of the club's first season there were thirty-two members. Since that historic period the membership of The Bohemians has swelled to half a thousand; there is a lusty offspring, the Musicians' Foundation, incorporated in 1914, with a present capital of $100,000, the interest of which is employed annually to relieve sick and needy musicians. In twelve years the latter organization has expended over $40,000 for this purpose. During the war a number of special funds were raised. One of them included $1,500 sent to friends of musicians in France. The record of The Bohemians during the war, when their members included citizens of every belligerent country, was phenomenal. They held every meeting, never lost a member, and aided destitute musicians regardless of race or nationality. Since the war The Bohemians and the Foundation have sent substantial aid to the Berlin Philharmonic, the Vienna Philharmonic, the Vienna Opera House Orchestra and hundreds of musicians throughout France and Central Europe. Best of all, The Bohemians have realized to an unusual degree the democratic aims and objects of their founders. Four of the latter gentlemen, Messrs. Goldmark, Herzog, Fraemcke and Grunwald, with Gardner Lamson and Abraham Lilienthal, Vice Presidents, and Walter L. Bogert, Secretary, remain today the leading spirits of this organization.

There, in brief, is the remarkable record of an organization unique in the metropolitan music world. And so consistently have all these gentlemen avoided the glare of publicity, so smoothly and quietly has their organization functioned, that the layman has little real knowledge of the extent and scope of the club's activities, above all of its salient characteristics.

In a score of years The Bohemians have had but two Presidents. Rubin Goldmark was the first chief executive and he is their President today. Mr. Kneisel became President in 1910 and remained in that office until his death last year, when Mr. Goldmark undertook the duties of his former position again. Ever since the founding of the club Mr. Goldmark and the dynamic Sigmund Herzog, organizer extraordinary, have been busy constructing the broad social highway of The Bohemians. The suave and accomplished President has, as toastmaster, presided over almost every occasion, formal and informal, private, semi-public or public, in the history of the club. Even during Mr. Kneisel's long and prosperous reign he remained the official spokesman of its President, who like Moltke, remarked Mr. Krehbiel, "was famous among other things for his ability to keep silent in seven languages if not more."

To Mr. Goldmark the growth and prosperity of The Bohemians are not accidental. "The secret of the club's success," he remarked, "lies in the informality of our proceedings, the logic of any artistic caste system within the club—above all, to our policy of keeping constantly in mind the aims and objects of the organization's founders. The purposes of the club are purely social and fraternal, designed, as Joseffy proposed, for good fellowship and camaraderie among musicians of every rank and degree.

"We had an informal meeting last season which illustrated precisely what I mean. On a certain evening a considerable number of us gathered to honor Fritz Kreisler on the occasion of his fiftieth birthday. Herbert Straus brought over three superb Stradivarius violins. Leopold Auer dropped in. No one expected to play, but some one suggested a Schubert quartet in order to give us an opportunity to hear these rare instruments. Willem Willeke the 'cellist was there, and the four artists who in turn sat at the first violin's desk for each movement of the quartet were Mr. Kreisler, Leopold Auer, Mischa Elman and Carl Flesch. Such an evening is not forgotten."

"About fifteen months before Mr. Kneisel died we all attended his birthday dinner and presented him with a rare manuscript letter of Beethoven. Our smokers, banquets, and entertainments have seen some remarkable gatherings made possible only by the all-inclusive embrace of our membership list and the unique spirit and atmosphere of the club. And I have discovered one amusing factor. Our members, after a busy week of music, want to be assured of more music before they will go anywhere. All of our smokers and meetings are informal, but I notice that a formally printed program of an evening's generous list of music lures more members to attend than a simple announcement that 'there will be music.'"

For a decade The Bohemians had an Lüchow's. Finally they were extended the courtesy of rooms in the Harvard Club, which they have used and enjoyed ever since.

The Bohemians incorporated the Musicians' Foundation May 6, 1914, in order "to foster the interests and advance the condition and social welfare of professional musicians and their families in case of need." The entire proceeds of next Sunday's dinner will be turned over to the Foundation, which, with a present endowment of $100,000, has distributed thousands of dollars throughout America and Europe during and since the period of the war. Beneficiaries range from needy musicians in New York, or others passing through the city to distant points, to the two daughters of Robert Schumann, Marie and Josephine, now living at Interlaken, Switzerland.

As for the distinguished guests of the forthcoming festivities, perhaps a few words are in order concerning their twenty-five years in the concert halls and musical life of America. Both Mr. Bauer and Mr. Gabrilowitsch, ardent Bohemians, have frequently contributed their services to the cause of the Musicians' Foundation. They came to this country in 1900 and have set a remarkable record for their public careers and their consistent artistic growth. Mr. Bauer was born in London in 1873. He began his career as a violinist, a pupil of Pollitzer, and he played in public when he was 9 years old. Regarding one of his concerts, given April 17, 1888, The Musical Times remarked: "Mr. Bauer is an efficient pianist, but his ability chiefly displays itself on the violin." But times have changed. There was a day in London when Harold Bauer and Fritz Kreisler gave a concert together. Bauer played the violin and Kreisler the piano. No one was surprised.

Mr. Bauer made his American début in Boston on Dec. 1, 1900. He made his first appearance in this city in a Kneisel Quartet concert, playing the "Kreutzer" sonata with Mr. Kneisel on Dec. 18, and on Dec. 20 he gave his first recital here. Mr. Bauer is an American citizen and since 1915 has made his home in New York.

Mr. Gabrilowitsch was born in Leningrad in 1878. He was graduated from the Petrograd Conservatory with the coveted Rubinstein prize, spent two years studying with Leschetizky in Vienna, and his first public recitals were given in 1896, when he was 18. He too came to America in 1900, and a year ago celebrated his silver jubilee, which happened to coincide with the Philadelphia Orchestra's own silver jubilee. With that orchestra in this city, a year ago, Mr. Gabrilowitsch played the same concerto, by Tchaikovsky, in B flat minor, which he had performed with the Philadelphia Orchestra at their first concert in 1900. For long years he cherished the purpose to become a conductor. In May, 1918, Mr. Gabrilowitsch signed a contract as conductor of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, a post he has filled ever since.

Mr. Bauer and Mr. Gabrilowitsch have frequently appeared in two-piano concerts, and an accurate but nameless prophet predicts that they will play together next Sunday evening.

REVIVE "THE CHIMES."

Les Cloches de Corneville, a third revival by the French Opera Comique Company, now in its fourth week at Jolson's Theatre.

"The Chimes of Normandy," opera comique in three acts; book in French by Clairville and Gabet, music by Robert Planquette. A favorite operetta, first produced at the Folies-Dramatiques, Paris, April 19, 1877. The scene is laid in Normandy in the time of Louis XV.

As in the merry England of Flotow's "Marta," so also in Planquette's most popular work of its class, the opening scene is a village "servants' fair." The insouciant Serpolette and the lovers, Jean Grenicheux, fisherman, and Germaine, daughter if the miser, Gaspard, take service with the Marquis Henri de Villeroi.

A second act is concerned with ghosts in the Chateau Villeroi. The owner, lately returned from exile, exposes with the help of his new servants at least one actual ghost. It is old Gaspard, who becomes crazed with fear of losing treasures the miser has concealed. Ending this episode is the chorus of the "chimes."

The castle, restored to splendor in the last act, is the scene of a fete. Papers found there point to Serpolette as the Marquis's lost heiress. Jean takes notice. Crazy Gaspard, recovering his reason, tells that Germaine is the young Marchioness instead. Marquis Henri is impressed. The lovers are united "in couples generally," as Kipling said, for a double wedding finale.

Thomas Salignac, the artistic director, has selected the cast as follows: Serpolette, Mlle. Syril; Germaine, Mlle. Bérard; Gaspard, M. Servatius; Marquis Henri, M. Hirigaray; Grenicheux, M. Félix; Bailif, M. Delamarcie; Notary, M. Payen; Fouinard, M. [illegible].

Jesse Pedrick and Celia Saloman will give a recital for two pianos on Wednesday evening at Steinway Hall.

Elsie Janis is an assisting singer in the third of Segurola's artistic mornings next Thursday at the Plaza.

Maria Mueller, Louise Graveure and Benno Rabinoff are R. E. Johnston's artists at the fourth Biltmore musicale on Friday morning.

CHORAL MUSIC.

The Christmas concert of the People's Chorus of New York will be held in the Town Hall on Wednesday night, Dec. 22. Mr. Camilieri's program includes Russian, French, German, Belgian, Slovakian, English, Haytian and American carols. In addition to the stage chorus, many members grouped in the body of the house will join in singing with the audience.

Lazare Saminsky leads a concert of Hebrew music for the League of Zionists-Revisionists on Sunday night, Dec. 26, at Carnegie Hall. Among the artists will be Eugenia Erganow, soprano of the Kiev Opera; Leon Cortilli, tenor of the Polish State Opera, Warsaw; Ignace Hilsberg, Isidor Gorn, Max Barnett and William Sauber, pianists; Yascha Fishberg, violin, and Gdal Saleski, 'cello.

The Schola Cantorum gives the first of two subscription concerts at Carnegie Hall on Dec. 29. Margaret Dessoff will appear as guest conductor, with the Adesdi Women's Chorus, a string orchestra from the Philharmonic and Louis Robert at the organ. The program comprises Latin texts of Bach, Sweelinck and Gibbons, with others of Schubert and Brahms, old French carols and a Spanish Nativity song arranged by Schindler.

A holiday program for the Young People's Symphony Concerts on New Year's Day at Carnegie Hall will again introduce Christmas songs by the Madrigal Choir of the Institute of Musical Art, with Miss Dessoff as conductor. Walter Damrosch will add orchestral works of Tchaikovsky and Debussy and the "Emperor" waltz of Johann Strauss.

"The Messiah" will be sung on Monday night, Dec. 27, at the first Carnegie Hall concert of the Oratorio Society of New York. Conductor Albert Stoessel is already rehearsing the chorus in Bach's B-minor Mass, to be sung in April, he believes, "for the first time in its entirety" in this city.

Boston's Handel and Haydn Society is singing "The Messiah" on Dec. 19 and 20. A single performance was scheduled yesterday at the San Francisco Festival.

The English Singers will give their next concert on Tuesday afternoon, Dec. 28, at the Town Hall. They are guests of the Haarlem Philharmonic at the Waldorf next Thursday.

MUSIC NOTES AFIELD.

The Fontainebleau Fine Arts and Music Schools Association has been incorporated under the laws of the State of New York. Walter Damrosch has been elected its first President. The Vice Presidents will be Whitney Warren, Ernest Peixotto and Francis Rogers. The various American committees for the enrolment of students will continue to function independently of each other. The Chairman of the Music School will again be Francis Rogers. The office of the association will be in the National Arts Club Studios, 119 East Nineteenth Street, New York.

The American Grand Opera Company of Portland, Oregon, after producing Bimboni's "Winona," presented the opera "Maritana," and will give E. Bruce Knowlton's "Monk of Toledo" in February. E. Bruce Knowlton, the musical director, is in charge of three separate choruses. The one that sings in "Winona" will not be required to sing in "Maritana," but will be given a rest until the production of the "Monk of Toledo" in the Spring. No member of the cast of "Winona" will be cast for the latter opera. The five operas that the company presents this season will thus be sung by three different companies. Arrangements have been made to give "Maritana" in the neighboring towns.

The sixth annual prize song competition conducted by the Swift & Co. Male Chorus has been won for the second time by Samuel Richard Gaines of Boston with his musical setting of the poem "Constancy." The jury consisted of Lee Sowerby, Arthur Olaf Anderson and D. A. Clippinger, all of Chicago. Louis Victor Saar of Chicago was accorded honorable mention for his setting of a poem called "The West." The winning number will be sung for the first time at the Swift & Co. Male Chorus concert in Orchestra Hall March 17, 1927. Florence Austral, dramatic soprano, will be the assisting artist.

Leopold Stokowski and the Philadelphia Orchestra presented the Third Symphony of Szymanowski for the first time Nov. 19 and 20 in Philadelphia. Richard Crooks was the tenor soloist.

Julia Claussen opened her Pacific tour in Reno, Nev., Nov. 29. In the course of her tour she is singing at Long Beach, Cal.; San Francisco, with the San Francisco Orchestra; Phoenix, Ariz.; San Diego, Los Angeles, Santa Maria, Oakland and Eureka, Cal. The contralto will sing in the "Messiah" at Los Angeles Dec. 10.

Josef Adler, the pianist of this city, has returned to America after an extended tour of Japan, embracing thirty-five recitals in various cities, among them Tokio, Kobe, Osaka, Yokohama, Nagasaki. He expected to find Occidental music as strange to Oriental ears as Japanese music to the average Westerner. It proved otherwise. Even in rural districts, where Western music was almost unknown, it was listened to with interest and accepted with enthusiasm.

Cecilia Hansen gave her first recital this season at London, Ontario, Nov. 29.

Musical America is offering a prize of $3,000 for the best symphonic work. Walter Damrosch, Alfred Hertz, Serge Koussevitzky, Frederick Stock and Leopold Stokowski will be the judges. The contest closes April 1, 1927.

The Civic Opera of Chicago is now a quarter through its fifth season and entering the second guarantee period of another five years. "In general," remarks Edward Moore in The Chicago Tribune, "the four and one-quarter years' activities have moved in the direction of standardizing the production of opera." Mr. Insull and his associates, not liking the star system, have tried to introduce an all-round ensemble. "There are, of course, two great objections to this ideal. One is that the American public always has been and still is languid to the lure of opera for its own sake—'Carmen' and some of the Verdi works seem to be about the only ones that are popular on their own account—and it always has been and still is more interested in the famous golden throats who appear in opera.

"The other is that in the present system of bringing out thirty or more operas in twelve weeks, inevitable though the system may be, a perfect ensemble is physically impossible. If you want to see the difference, go, let us say, to Baireuth, where they bring out only a few operas in their season, engage artists who in general would not be permitted to sing second rôles here, but where they create an ensemble that is an ensemble.

"The wonder is that in presenting opera at high pressure the Chicago company does as well as it does. In fact, it is a marvelous organization. Opera after opera goes on, generally pretty well cast—the flagrant, the incredible casting errors of a few seasons ago are disappearing by degrees—and sung and staged with a spirit that carries them across by the force of their own impetus. Just the same, there is no sense in trying to believe that the ensemble is perfect." Mr. Moore has nothing but praise for the capable stage direction of Charles Moore and the stage scenery of Julian Dové.

Jacques Thibaud, the French violinist, will return to the United States for a short tour in January, February and March, 1928. He will spend the 1926-27 season in Europe. M. Thibaud appeared for the first time in thirteen years with the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra under Furtwängler during the past season, and was greeted with great enthusiasm by the Berlin public. The Berlin Tageblatt said:

"After an absence of thirteen years it was a great pleasure to welcome back Jacques Thibaud. Even before the war we knew of him as France's foremost violinist, which he remains to the present day. His style is more mature and he is a true representative of the French school. The beauty of his tone, mellow, pure and unimpaired, has an irresistible effect upon his listeners, while the connoisseur revels in the elegance of his technic and conception."

The National Federation of Music Clubs announces that it will hold a contest for student members during the singing biennial at Chicago, from April 10 to 25, 1927. The contestants must be between the ages of 16 and 23. Prizes of $150 will be awarded in each of four events: Piano, violin, male voice and female voice. The prize donors are Mrs. Worcester Warner, the Cincinnati Music Club and the Columbus Women's Music Club.

MAJORS AND MINORS.

Moriz Rosenthal is to play next month at the Biltmore, the Metropolitan and Aeolian Hall. He appears in February with the Boston Symphony, in March a third time here at Aeolian Hall, in April at Chicago and with the Philadelphia Orchestra, and in May at the Newark Festival.

Louise Homer Stires, who has not been heard in concert for the past year, but who will make at least two appearances with her mother this season, has been engaged for a concert in Pontiac, Mich., in May.

Eugene Goossens and Charles Henry Meltzer are to write a lyric drama on the life of François Villon. Mr. Goossens has just done a musical setting for the play of "The Constant Nymph." Mr. Meltzer has been making English versions of grand opera texts for the Edith Rockefeller McCormick Edition, to be issued in Chicago.

The Gaelic Musical Society of America, founded by the late Victor Herbert, has announced a popular concert series every Friday in high school halls of Brooklyn, the first to take place at the Teachers' College, Nostrand Avenue and Park Place, on Jan. 14.

The Band Leaders' Association has forwarded a letter of Walter Damrosch to Washington, in furtherance of the passage of a bill before the House and already passed by the Senate to provide artistic maintenance of the United States Army bands and commissions for their officers.

School teachers throughout the city are preparing their students to enter the New York Music Week contests, which are expected to double the registration of any previous year.

SHAW AS A MUSIC CRITIC

Early and Dark Days of England's Aristophanes—Events Afield

ARCHIBALD HENDERSON in his "Life of Bernard Shaw" tells of the early activities of the English Aristophanes when he busied himself, in the early and dark days of his career, as a music critic.

Before he was 15 Bernard Shaw knew at least one important work by Handel, Mozart, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Rossini, Bellini, Donizetti, Verdi and Gounod from cover to cover. He studied the piano himself and stumbled through the piano scores of Donizetti, Mozart, Bizet and Berlioz, whistling the airs by heart. He did some accompanying, but never really mastered the instrument. Even today he can read an opera or symphony score on his piano. At 20 the boy came to London and pursued various avocations. Between 1876 and 1885 literature had dowered him with the sum of £6. He began by deviling for a music critic, but his notices led to the stoppage of all the concert advertisements and ruined the paper. His career as a critic dates from 1885, when he wrote articles for The World on fiction, music, the drama, &c. The other critics came to treat Shaw as a reckless liar and privileged lunatic. He became music critic of The Star in 1888 through the good offices of Clement K. Shorter. William Archer said that "Bernard Shaw has, to my thinking, a peculiar genius for bringing day-by-day musical criticism into vital relation with esthetics at large, and even with ethics and politics—in a word, with life."

Shaw used the word "music" in a comprehensive, platonic sense, for he wrote about anything and everything that came into his head. He once spoke of his column on The Star as a mixture of triviality, vulgarity, farce and tomfoolery mixed with genuine criticism. Shaw said that he secured the privileges he usurped first by taking care that Corno di Bassetto, his nom de plume, should always be amusing and, secondly, by using a considerable knowledge of music, which nobody suspected him of possessing, to provide a solid substratum of genuine criticism for the mass of outrageous levities and ridiculous irrelevancies.

Shaw had heard good music in his home, had tried his hand at composing, had also made some study of counterpoint. When Louis Engel, the best-hated critic in Europe, gave up his post on The World, Shaw was his successor. The latter had strong convictions on the subject of music, musicians and true musical genius; the pedantry of academic schools and the jargon of conventional musical criticism were his favorite targets. The musical criticism which takes the analysis of "Bach in B minor" as its point of departure is held up to unmeasured scorn. When Mr. O'Connor gave him the job, he said to Shaw: "Say what you like, but for ——— don't tell us anything about the 'Bach in B minor.'"

Bernard Shaw brought his critical faculty to bear upon music in England during the period when the academic faction held full sway. The leading musicians of the day were Dr. Mackenzie, Sir George Grove, Dr. Hubert Parry, Sir Joseph Barnby, Villiers Stanford, Goring Thomas, Arnold Dolmetsch, Cowen, Sterndale Bennet, Gilbert and Sullivan, &c. Paderewski was slowly mounting the ladder of success, Patti was singing her farewell concerts. Shaw had little liking at first for Paderewski the virtuoso, but in 1893 he considered him the greatest of living pianists. Shaw had the sincerest admiration for David Bispham; the de Reszkes won his praise "because they sang like dignified men instead of like male viragoes in the dramatic Italian style." He called "our still adored Patti" in 1893 "the most accomplished of mezzo-sopranos." To him Holman was the greatest violoncellist he had ever heard; Joachim's tone impressed him as being magnificent.

In Shaw's view Mozart was the ideal, the supreme composer, and he asserted that Mozart had influenced his dramatic work more than any dramatist since Shakespeare. The second part of "Faust" impressed Shaw as the summit of Schumann's achievement in dramatic writing. He always found Brahms insufferably tedious when he tried to be profound, but delightful when he merely tried to be pleasant and naively sentimental. He regarded Verdi as the greatest of living dramatic composers.

For the solemnly manufactured operas of Saint-Saëns Shaw felt not only distaste, but genuine contempt. Early in his career he gave up Paris as impossible from the artistic viewpoint. London he did not mind so much: the Londoner did not pretend to be artistic, and was not at all ashamed of this condition. The Parisian, on the other hand, was a mixture of hypocrisy and ignorance. The most significant feature of Shaw's career as a musical critic was his championship of Wagner. At twenty he had made the acquaintance of Chichester Bell, a cousin of Graham Bell, inventor of the telephone, an ardent Wagnerite. Shaw bought a vocal score of "Lohengrin" and immediately became an enthusiastic disciple of the German master. The six years of Shaw's activity as a musical critic fell within the decade of Sir Augustus Harris's greatest operatic enterprises. Shaw spent a large part of his time making onslaught after onslaught on the spurious artistic prestige of Covent Garden. In the same way that he fought the battles of Wagner did Shaw champion the cause of Richard Strauss in 1910.

English audiences heard the Venetian String Quartet broadcast a program of modern Italian composers for the British Broadcasting Company. The London Times again said: "Modern composers are like candid friends; their passion for nakedness in truth often leads to concentrated unpleasantness. The Italians have always been noted for the smoothness of their musical speech, and contemporary Italian composers, while repudiating the soft-spoken blandishments of Verdi and Puccini, are still less uncompromising than some other nationalities. Malipiero, for example, showed in the song-cycle 'The Italian Season' something like vicious temper. He writes major seconds when he means unisons, and so produces in his piano writing a muddy texture; these clotted discords he hammers out emphatically and sets the voice to declaim above it. There may be sense in it, but it is buried beneath a deal of nonsense.

"The string quartets of Labroca and de Guarnieri have something of the same asperity, but they have a scientific if not an esthetic interest. For both composers have broken with all that is associated with the Italian style except a certain fluidity and are writing, not melodies, but counterpoint of the modern autonomous kind. Each instrument, so to speak, has its own latchkey and comes in when it likes. Labroca's quartet is concise and abrupt, but it has something to say, and, on the whole, says it without undue unpleasantness. This contrapuntal tendency is likely in time to prove fruitful. Respighi's 'Done' quartet is modern in spirit, but more clearly related to tradition."

Bruno Walter directed three orchestral concerts in London during the week of Nov. 14. He appeared once with the London Symphony Orchestra and twice with the Royal Philharmonic Orchestra. The Royal Philharmonic Society called attention to the fact that at his first appearance in England, in March, 1909, at a Philharmonic concert he directed Schumann's first symphony and the "Leonora" Overture, both of which appeared on one of the programs.

The fourth annual Eastbourne musical festival opened Nov. 4 and closed Nov. 14. Sir Thomas Beecham directed the opening concert; Sir Edward Elgar and Sir Henry Wood were among the guest conductors. Chief interest centred in the conducting of Captain H. G. Amers, the municipal director, to whom the success of the Eastbourne festival is mainly due.

TO GREET SCHUMANN-HEINK.

Mme. Ernestine Schumann-Heink will be the guest of honor at a testimonial luncheon arranged by the governing board of the Town Hall, on Tuesday, Dec. 14, at the Hotel Astor, as a tribute to her golden jubilee as a singer. Among 1,000 promised guests are Geraldine Farrar, Mrs. Theodore Roosevelt Jr., Mrs. William H. Bliss, Frances Alda, Antonio Scotti, Harold Bauer, Ernest Schelling, Frederick Steinway, Richard Aldrich, Harry Harkness Flagler, Arthur Bodanzky and Francis Rogers. Though unable to attend, Giulio Gatti-Casazza, Josef Hofmann, Frederick Stock and Walter Damrosch will send messages to be read at the luncheon. Henry W. Taft will preside.

Among many others sponsoring the popular tribute are Governor Alfred E. Smith, Felix M. Warburg, Mrs. John T. Pratt, Michael Friedsam, Robert Erskine Ely, John G. Agar and John Bates Clark.

CURRENT PROGRAM NOTES.

Brahms's "Requiem" will be sung at the Cathedral of St. John the Divine tonight by Miles Farro's choir, assisted by Grace Kerns and Frank Cuthbert as soloists and by Channing Lefebvre, organist of Trinity Church.

Charles D. Isaacson is ending his thirteen years of free concerts this Sunday night at De Witt Clinton High School.

Gitz Glaze, soprano, will give a concert in the hall of the Engineering Societies, 29 West Thirty-ninth Street, on Tuesday evening.

Arturo Toscanini is announced to conduct a special benefit performance in aid of the Neighborhood Music School during his engagement with the Philharmonic Orchestra. It will take place on the evening of Jan. 18 at the Metropolitan Opera House.

Shura Cherkassky, Pianist, in Carnegie Hall Recital Tomorrow.

FURTHER LOCAL EVENTS

THE Brooklyn Orchestral Society opens its subscription concerts at the Brooklyn Academy tomorrow evening under the direction of Herbert Braham. Johannes Brahms's symphony No. 2, in D, is on the program, with Humperdinck's dream music from "Hansel und Gretel," Sinigaglia's "Piedmont Dances," Weber's overture to "Der Freischuetz" and an overture in D by Handel. The soprano soloist in airs from Mozart's "Seraglio" and Verdi's "Rigoletto" is Irma de Baun.

The New York Symphony Orchestra's second matinee at the Brooklyn Academy next Saturday is the annual Christmas program. Walter Damrosch conducts Tchaikovsky's fourth symphony, Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" and the Chopin-Aubert "Night of the Magi." Margaret Dessoff leads two groups of Christmas songs by the Carol Choir of the Institute of Musical Art.

WITH THE ORCHESTRAS.

Mme. Schumann-Heink, whose "jubilee tour" marks a fiftieth anniversary on the stage, is making her "only concert appearance" in Manhattan in this week's New York Symphony pair of Wagner programs. She returns again later in the "Ring" cycle at the Metropolitan.

Beethoven's "Choral Fantasy" will be performed at next Sunday's concert of the Friends of Music, following the start. Carl Friedberg will be the piano soloist and the chorus will also sing a group of folksong arrangements by Brahms.

John McCormack and Georges Georgesco will assist the Philharmonic Orchestra in its pension fund concert on Dec. 21 at Carnegie Hall.

The American Orchestral Society will give its annual Christmastide concert on Monday afternoon, Dec. 20, in Aeolian Hall.

Edmund Meisel of Berlin is composer of the musical score heard at the Biltmore Theatre's recent production of the film "Potemkin."

The Vitaphone's "Tannhäuser" overture, by the Philharmonic, has broken all records with 200 consecutive performances at Warner's Theatre.

VARIOUS MUSIC EVENTS.

Beatrice Herford and Dora Stroeva share a program arranged by John Murray Anderson tonight at the Park Avenue Theatre in Fifty-eighth Street with a Grand Guignol play, "The Medium," acted by Helen Freeman, Rollo Peters and Joseph Macaulay.

David and Clara Mannes continue their invitation recitals of the ten Beethoven sonatas for violin and piano at the Mannes School this afternoon.

Cesar Franck's organ works form a full program for the second of Lynwood Farnam's December recitals at the Church of the Holy Communion tomorrow evening.

The Greenwich, Conn., Young People's Concerts will offer on Wednesday a program of dances "from Gluck to Gershwin" by an orchestra under David Mannes.

The Singers' Club of New York has a private concert on Thursday evening in Aeolian Hall.

Mr. and Mrs. Alexander Block give a joint recital of sonatas tonight at the Educational Alliance.

CHAMBER MUSIC PLANS.

The New York Chamber Music Society's second program next Sunday at the Hotel Plaza Sunday Salons, now in their second year, will include Bach's concerto for two pianos, with the Misses Beebe and Reisenberg and a string quintet; Schumann's andante and variations, also with two pianos; a new trio for wind instruments by Gennaro and the "Kammersinfonie" of Paul Juon.

Ethel Leginska is announced to appear with the New York String Quartet at its Aeolian Hall concert on Monday, Dec. 20. The music comprises Haydn's quartet in G minor, Op. 74; Beethoven's in F minor, Op. 95, and, with Miss Leginska, the quintet of Schumann.

Mischa Elman is leaving the local stage for two years after his string quartet's last two subscription concerts, on Dec. 21 and 28, in Aeolian Hall. Beethoven's F minor and Franck's D major quartets are on the earlier program, while the other will include Mozart's D major, Brahms's C minor and the quartet in F by Ravel.

The Flonzaley Quartet and Ernest Hutcheson, pianist, have been engaged for a performance of the Schumann quintet to be broadcast Jan. 11 by Station WEAF.

The London String Quartet on its current American tour will play Jan. 31 at Galveston.

Venice in Pictures Tonight.

Venice and the Italian lakes will be shown in color and motion pictures at the fifth and last of E. M. Newman's "Sunny Italy" travel talks in Carnegie Hall tonight. The entire series has been greeted by crowded houses at a time when the local unseasonable storms offered a sharp contrast to the landscapes caught by the camera last Summer overseas. This evening's pictures add a gondola ride through the city of the Adriatic, the Piazza San Marco, Doge's Palace, Piazetta and Rialto, and a tour of the Alpine lakes, with their background of snow peaks and nearer glimpses of villa gardens and flowers.

MOUNT HOLYOKE CAROL CHOIR

THE Mount Holyoke College Choir, which is singing ancient Christmas carols in Hartford, New York, Philadelphia and Washington this Christmas season, is demonstrating that college singers may find a field of music in which, without entering into competition with professional musicians, they can do something of real creative value and of interest to the music-loving public. Forty years ago, when caroling at Yuletide was almost unknown in this country, William Hammond, Professor of Music at Mount Holyoke College, began to train the children of Holyoke to sing Christmas songs. At that time few carols of genuine worth were available. Cherishing an ideal beyond that of teaching youngsters to chant Sunday school ditties, Professor Hammond started on a search for better and more authentic material.

His search has been greatly aided by his brother-in-law, Professor Bliss Reed of Yale University, who obtained in Europe an unpublished collection consisting of ten thousand Christmas carols, taken down from the singing of communities and churches in many parts of Europe. Every Christmas season the New Haven Carol Society is issuing words and music of eight of these carols. Before the published carols are available, the Carol Choir of Mount Holyoke goes out to introduce some of the loveliest ones in neighboring cities. Last year New York and Hartford heard for the first time three very lovely carols never before sung in this country: "O Nightingale," a dainty little French carol, which applied all the artificial graces of old French love poetry to the Christmas story; "The Nuns of Saint Mary's Carol," a pathetic Latin hymn of the fifteenth century, which, sung unaccompanied, sounded like the echoing and re-echoing of delicate bells, and "Down In Yon Forest," from Derbyshire, England, having a suggestion of the atmosphere of Authurian romance in its sombre beauty. This year the Mount Holyoke Choir includes in its programs four new carols issued by the New Haven Carol Society, but not yet generally available. These are "Wake Nightingale," a Franconian carol; "Come, Rock the Christ Child," from the German of 1604; a Poetvin carol of the fifteenth century, and an old Czech carol, "Hearken To Me." All the carols sung by his choir have been chosen by Mr. Hammond for their suitability for girl's and and children's voices.

Mr. Hammond began his work with the idea that children might be the most natural singers of old carols.

Water Color Drawings of Ships by Paul-Emile Pajot—Oils, Water Colors and Etchings on View in Various Exhibitions

THE water color drawings of French clippers and steamboats and their intimate relations with salty and very business-like seas, by Paul-Emile Pajot, at the Valentine Dudensing Galleries, formed the most charming exhibition this chronicler, as an esthetic roundsman, visited during the past week.

It was a relief to escape from the originality of accomplished mediocrity—with its hazy nocturnes of the sea and Spring and Autumn, and those portraits hopefully copied from Sargent, or the so-familiar travel notes of the so-familiar places—into a room fresh with the winds of the many seas. M. Pajot is not the rage in Paris because he is a great artist but because he is a workman who genuinely loves the world he celebrates, and he knows how to celebrate it so as to awaken a nostalgia for the "blowsy" seductions of the sea. One is not surprised to learn that he has been a seaman all his life—the knowledge of all kinds of craft is only too apparent.

At first glance you might take Pajot's drawings for French prints of fifty years ago; but upon examination they are quickly detected as being the work of one bright mind, and a bright modern mind at that. Pajot's drawings of ships haven't the stiffness of the older prints or their frequently uninspired and somewhat strangulated lines. They are gay with red, blue and green wash, and fly on the waters with an awkward grace that is captivating. Art, you will have gathered, is an afterthought with M. Pajot; but who cares when a man can make a room so bright and cheerful as he does the suave Valentine Dudensing Galleries? These drawings would give tang to any room.—Until Dec. 25.

THE oils, water colors and drawings of Richard Lahey, at the Artists' Gallery (51 East Sixtieth Street), disclose a new artist whose work is still in the bright realm of "promise." Brickyards and little French ports and girls involved with their chemises comprise Mr. Lahey's territory; yet his esthetic excursions in this much traveled country possess a distinctive interest. His brickyards, both in oil and in water color, are streaked with the sooty horizons which are the black flowers born of busy smokestacks. The red of the brick buildings is subdued, and the raw ugliness of those squat buildings is related to the vibrant, pulsating stream of American life. Mr. Lahey is least successful in his drawings and oils. The water colors have freshness, but the oils are still rather painty and sticky, and the drawings have more strength than flexible form or variety. However, Mr. Lahey has some of the "makin's."—Until Dec. 25.

HENRY THEODORE LEGGETT'S water colors, at the Durand-Ruel Galleries, mirror, romantically, Summer squalls, Summer seas and "Autumn Splendor." Mr. Leggett's story is strangely familiar, having as its heroes "proud waves" and "idle sails," and as its villains numerous "breakers." In fine, what Mr. Leggett has to say has been said before. He has his own little graces, a facility to contrive a dreamy sea or a "Tourquoise Wave." He knows, too, how to make foam seem milky. But what one must say in the end of Mr. Leggett's work is that it is pretty rather than impressive; sentimental rather than real.—Until Dec. 16.

IN her portraits of men, women and children of the society world, at the Ainslie Galleries, Margaret Fitzhugh Browne manifests a refreshing honesty in recording the likenesses of her sitters. She uses intuition rather than Sargent tricks and evades openings for tactful flatteries of her sitters, with the result that her subjects resemble human beings.

This is not to say that Miss Browne's painting gifts are extraordinary, for they are rather prosaic. The child in "A Nursery Interlude" is not alive. Its kicking legs are so stiff as to seem made of wood. And the fruit of the still life of "The Ship Model" is waxy—reminiscent, in fact, of the artificial fruit used for decorative purposes in cheap ice cream palace windows. However, Miss Browne does contrive to introduce a certain life into the features of her sitters—as, say, in her portrait of Senator Borah. And that is a great deal nowadays.

Also exhibiting at the Ainslie Galleries are Rosamond E. Smith, represented by a group of decorative paintings of Bermuda, Maryland and California, and Rudolph F. Bunner, with accomplished, if somewhat tight, pantings of "Twin Oaks" and "Indian Summer" and "Early Spring." Need one do more than quote these titles to suggest the aspects of those paintings? —Until Dec. 16.

A COMPREHENSIVE gathering of romantic American "cabinet" paintings are now on view at the Babcock Galleries. The most notable works of this gathering are by A. P. Ryder, Emil Carlsen, Bruce Crane, Alexander H. Wyant, John Noble, R. H. Potthast, Eugene Higgins, Ernest Lawson, George Inness and Ralph Blakelock.—Through December.

THE second exhibition this season of James McBey's etchings, this time at the Knoedler Galleries, does not sparkle with wonders not already attributed to this successful artist. The only difference between this exhibition and the last is that some new etchings are shown along with the older ones. There are etchings of places; the one of "The Cowgate, Edinburgh," makes that Scotch city seem a dour and sinister place indeed; and etchings of mills and deserts and camels.—Until Dec. 15.

GEORGE PEARSE ENNIS is showing at the Gainsborough Galleries some forthright, romantic oils and water-colors of Austria, its mountains, "burgs" and streams—also its natives and hunters. As usual, Mr. Ennis is exhilarated by natural beauties, and his exhilaration is fairly contagious. His is pleasant, representational painting, and even though it lacks a certain necessary weight and solidity it has color and movement. The paintings of Edmund Greacen, also at these galleries, are misty likenesses of ladies in rose, tan and pink, and hazy impressions of "Winter Mornings" and "Autumn Woods." Mr. Greacen uses the movie technique of seeing his sitters through gauze. Naturally they are somewhat vague.—Until Dec. 15.

THERE is an interesting exhibition of original specimens of stained-glass painting from the twelfth to sixteenth centuries at the Arnold Seligman, Rey Galleries. Here one may see the brilliant glass painting of the twelfth century in France, the figures of the heavenly folk or those aspiring to heaven outlined in the rich, stylicised postures of those bright dark ages.

It is interesting to note that in the loosening up of those postures in the fourteenth, fifteenth and sixteenth century windows this richness somehow has been lost. The color is not as intense and the quality of the compositions is not as rich. The German stained glass of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries is inspired by those early woodcuts you find in the first illuminated books, and by Albrecht Dürer and his contemporaries. The English stained glass does not seem to have been inspired by anything. It is the dullest chapter of this art's development as illustrated by this exhibition.—Until Dec. 25.

SOME rather unpretentious murals of Cortez's adventures among the Aztecs, the work of Victor White, are being exhibited at the Arden Galleries. They are for a private great house, and stick pretty close to historical details.—Until Dec. 25.

AT the Art Centre Mrs. Leonie Gilmour is exhibiting her collection of Japanese wood-block color prints from the originals by Hokusai, Hiroshige, Utamoro and Shunsho. Mrs. Gilmour is also showing a fine collection of jade, crystal, amethyst, carnelian, amber and jewelry of the Orient. This is an exhibition especially designed for the Christmas art lover.—Until Dec. 18.

RED PLUSH ERA HAS PASSED

By IRVING T. BUSH.

THE early Pullman period has gone, and taking its place in art, architecture, music and the kindred methods of self-expression in beauty is a new phase of national life. America is passing into the period of artistic expression.

Two hundred years ago some one said that Europe was being covered with a white mantle of cathedrals. A French art critic recently said it might be claimed that the United States is being covered with a white mantle of art galleries and museums. They are springing up everywhere, filled with treasure from all parts of the world. Their contents may not always be selected with discrimination, but they are chosen with an intent to educate the people to a desire for more beautiful things. As our artistic education progresses, the worthless is discarded and its place is filled by more careful selections.

Not only are those galleries being filled with art from the Old World, but our melting pot is bringing forth as well, artists of great excellence. Their works hang upon the walls. The Grand Central Art Galleries, of which I am a trustee, is an institution created by New York City for the double purpose of helping good American artists market their work and of broadening appreciation of American art. Its galleries are spacious, and are visited by thousands; but if the plans of the trustees bear fruit the New York galleries will merely be the headquarters for greater effort. No profit is made by any one connected with the organization, save that of the artists whose work sells.

Work of American Artists.

The Grand Central galleries do effective work, but our hope lies far more in the exhibitions we send to cities in all parts of the country. Last year exhibitions of several hundred paintings were sent to Aurora, Ill.; Nashville and Memphis, Tenn.; Houston, Texas; Atlanta, Ga.; Norfolk, Va. All of these exhibitions were successful. In Nashville, where the exhibit was shown in the beautiful reproduction of the Pantheon, 15,000 people passed through the galleries in one day. It was necessary to call police reserves to keep the crowd in line. In Houston, $80,000 worth of pictures and statuary was sold in two weeks. Other experiences no less interesting occurred in other cities. Does this not argue that American appreciation is not limited to the movies?

The art of America is in its infancy. Comparison, to be just, must be with the present art of Europe, not with the work of past ages. We need not apologize for the work of living American artists. I challenge comparison with any country in Europe. There are great artists in each country, but the average of American art is today as high as in any country in the world. I do not make this statement in a boastful spirit, but because so many of us believe that anything artistic to be excellent must be imported.

Usually it is not a good thing to talk about our own qualities, but to give our friends a chance. Art buyers in America are so affected by the European complex that at the risk of seeming to boast, I pay my tribute to the excellence of the work of American artists. It is to be remembered that we are just beginning. The melting pot is still boiling. Education is progressing and the art students of America are tramping the art galleries of Europe.

In architecture, the oldest of all the arts, it is conceded that the best American work is of a high degree of excellence—appreciated both in our own country and the world over. Much of it consists of variations of the work of ancient Greece, but the adaptations are original and the application of old lines of beauty to the high buildings of America has been the outstanding development of world architecture during the last generation.

In music, progress is being made. We have not developed a characteristical music expression, unless it be the jazz or the mammy songs of the South; but the symphony orchestras in nearly every city in the country rival our museums and galleries in number. Not long ago we sent our cheese to Holland to be painted red. We still send our sopranos to Europe to be renamed. It is the working of the European complex in our simple minds. We cannot believe that Miss Jones can sing as well as Signorina Jonita. This period will pass, and soon we shall not spell the names of our sopranos with spaghetti or put whiskers on the names of American violinists.

The American playwright is developing. Not many years ago American theatres were filled with English plays. Today my chief complaint in London is that the theatres there are filled with American plays.

The art world of any country is but a section of its people, yet it is possible to form a correct judgment of the characteristics of a people of any period by studying the art of that period. Today we live in a jazz age. We jazz to business and back. We jazz over the telephone all day and after eating a jazz dinner we jazz in the evening. It is difficult for some of us to judge correctly a music, a literature or a theatre produced to satisfy a jazz appetite. The next generation will pass seasoned judgment upon the artistic merit of this age.

At least the artistic in the United States is beginning to receive the attention it deserves. An age of beauty lies ahead. It may not be beauty as defined by standards of past ages, but it will be a beauty of refinement of line and elimination of crudity—the beauty of a new civilization and of a new age. The day of the red plush sofa is past and the Rogers group has crept upstairs to the attic.

MOHAMMEDAN BRONZE

VERY rare, and each year becoming more difficult to obtain, are good examples of Mohammedan bronzes dating back to the twelfth century. Last Spring at Chicago's Art Institute there was an exhibition of these bronzes which contained a large proportion of all available Islamic bronzes of merit. From this collection, through the generosity of Mrs. Noble B. Judah, the Art Institute has been presented with two fine examples, one a large bronze ewer measuring fifteen inches in height, beautifully designed and decorated. The other is a bronze bottle, shaped like an inverted goblet, with numerous inscriptions in Arabic arranged down its sides.

CHILDREN'S BOOKS

THE Art Institute of Chicago is holding, until Dec. 6, in the Children's Museum, an exhibition of illustrated books for children, dating from the early seventeenth century to the present time.

CLAUDE MONET : THE LAST IMPRESSIONIST

ROBUST GENIUS

Substance in Monet's Art Under Its Vital Surfaces

By ELISABETH L. CARY.

CLAUDE MONET died last Sunday, full of years and honor. His is one of the names in the history of art to which will be attached a single idea, the idea of light. Notwithstanding his great variety, his portraits, landscapes, figure subjects, still life, marines, street scenes, buildings, interiors, when we think of him we think first and last of his research into the baffling problems of light.

That they were so baffling, that they constantly mocked his efforts, acted as a spur to his convinced mind. He felt that, armed with science, he could ask his own material, plain pigment, to capture the secrets of atmosphere and sunlight. He used no tricks. He looked deeply and saw clearly. He placed his colors in a relation that would give, he thought, the subtler aspects of objects seen through atmosphere and played upon by light, seen through constantly moving air and played upon by constantly changing sunlight. It was this movement from which nothing in nature could escape that he followed unceasingly. Of course his goal was beyond his reach, beyond the reach of any one; but the stubborn splendor of his battle for his idea places him among the masters for whom there can be no death.

He was born in 1840 and he was long enough old to have a number of partial biographies appear. Gustave Geffroy's book, written five or six years ago, offers the largest number of documents bearing upon his steadily interesting career.

Looking Like a Sailor.

Geffroy first met him in the month of September, 1886. The place was Belle-isle-en-Mer and the artist came into the eating room of an inn looking like a sailor, with his rough jacket, thick boots and seaman's cap. Although Parisian born, he seemed to Geffroy to belong to this primeval coast more truly than to any city.

His life as an artist began early. At 16 he was in Paris, drawing from the figure, visiting the exhibitions and forming his young opinions with, on the whole, more accuracy than error. In a letter to his friend Boudin during his first Paris year he describes an exhibition of "moderns" that included the school of 1830 and proved French art less sunk in decadence than it was said to be. But Troyon, he said, could not hold his own with the others. Three years later he had changed some of his opinions. Troyon was quite different, had given him carefully considered advice, had made him feel something of his importance as an artist actually about to arrive. Troyon has become "superb," "marvelous," "magnificent." Nevertheless, even under the stimulus of an older man's flattering attention, the little Monet kept his detachment, when it came to his own Promethean purpose, to bring down the light from heaven for mortals to enjoy. The shadows in the work of this "glorious" Troyon were a little too black, surely too black. Boudin would tell him if this were not the case. But one feels under this discreet humility that whatever Boudin might tell him the shadows would remain for him too black.

Monet was the first of the Impressionists to devote himself to open air painting, and he survived all the companions who fought with him under this banner with the strange device. It was the title he gave to a picture exhibited in 1874, "Impression: soleil levant," that seized upon the imagination of critics and public and caused the name to be fastened upon the whole exhibiting group. Thereafter they were "Impressionists," and as such were treated to a peculiarly stupid form of ridicule. They accepted the title with resignation and made it their rallying cry.

They went their separate ways. To think of Monet as waving the banner of Impressionism above his head while disciples flocked after him, obeying his commands and admiring his performance, would be entirely to mistake his personality. He was no preacher of theory, no founder of school; he was only an artist intent upon pushing as far as he might researches already begun by his predecessors.

Result Far From Mechanical.

He cleaned his palette of blacks and browns and ochres. He tried to approach the prismatic sparkle of sunlight with a juxtaposition of pure colors blending in the eye of the spectator at the distance from which he naturally would look at a painting. This was his special contribution to the mechanics of his art. The result was far from mechanical. On the contrary, it lifted landscape painting into a region of shimmering illusion that less suggested mechanics than magic and that had a singularly enlivening effect upon the spirits—as when the sun itself comes out and clears away the fog and darkness.

Of course, these pictures today are neither so magical nor so iconoclastic as when they appeared in little Paris shops to have a Daumier ask the shopkeeper what it was that compelled him to exhibit such things to the public; to have a Corot congratulate one of the younger artists of the period upon breaking away from such influence. As we have become used to Monet's way of seeing and that of others who experienced the enlightenment of his influence, impressionism has become a form of truth.

In Monet's early pictures, line was close and significant. Let one observe the edge of the tablecloth in "Le Déjeuner," or the rippling stripes and bands in the costume of "Camille, or La Dame à la Robe Verte"; in his later pictures, less precise, but equally significant, as may be seen in the splendid arches of bridges, cathedral doorways, palaces.

"Monet Painting in His Garden," by Renoir, Date 1873.

He lost interest in line as line. He never lost interest in or forgot the importance of boundaries and directions. He worked with mass, and the edges of his masses were crumbled and broken under the attack of direct sunlight. The dance of ephemeral gleams of this sunlight across the surface of an object enveloped in atmosphere was his constant preoccupation. This led even his most ardent admirers to ignore the solidity of the objects over which dance these gleams continually passing and returning. This solidity he himself never ignored.

Probably no artist of Monet's mental force and penetration could, whatever his immediate aim, ignore fundamental conditions in his subject; but there is no indication in his work as we see it today that he had any idea of doing this. The Cathedral of Rouen, which inspired one writer to refer to Monet's "imponderable technique" as disengaging form from all the fetters of weight, volume and substance and causing all surfaces to share the insubstantial mobility of the waves of light lapping over them—this Rouen cathedral, in its actuality, rises ponderable and rugged in spite of the airy decoration of its facade and the elaborate carving of its portals. Monet has thrown over the great edifice the caressing drapery of sunlit atmosphere, but the massive forms beneath wear this as a muscular corypheus the ballet tarlatan, no more imperiled by it than is the original structure by its ornament.

In color, too, the paintings of Monet have, to the modern vision, little of what his contemporaries found startling brilliancy. Although high in key and composed, in the later examples, of pure colors juxtaposed, they have none of the pyrotechnic fire of Turner's work. Something of French moderation stepped in to resolve the ardors of full noonday or blazing sunset into a light easily to be borne by human eyes. Subtle as their vibration seems, others with a looser weaving of brush strokes have gained a more mysterious movement.

In fact, the impression left by Monet's work, after a long experience of seeing fine examples upon repeated occasions, is rather an impression of force than of dexterity, of sturdiness rather than delicacy; of that breadth of view, that largeness of composition, that profundity of insight which we associate in another art of France with a Balzac and not with a de Musset. One sees in this long legacy of impassioned and thoughtful achievement a dedication to the whole of the natural scene and not alone to the illumined surface or the enveloping vapor. One sees that in modeling the mass that observant vision has taken account of all detail not as detached from but as affecting the mass.

The physical and mental infrequently work together to prolong life, and many an octogenarian seems to have attained his fourscore years by giving his mental faculties persistent rest. Occasionally, however, as in the case of Claude Monet, we find a tough fibre, a predisposition to long life, that not only keeps the body but the mind at attention after all is labor and sorrow for the common mortal. The work in such a case, if it can be followed, tells the story of unusual strength, of a robust genius of extraordinary character and will, of self-confidence, imaginative force and power to hold an idea to its fulfillment. It is natural that work with such a story to tell should have been considered by contemporary conservatives of feeble intelligence to "make war upon beauty." It is natural that such work by critics of inflexible tradition and dull vision should have been considered the outcome of a diseased brain. It is equally natural that the artist producing it should have been a man of deep humility, dissatisfied with his each performance, confessing to his friend after more than half a century of unceasing effort that he permits many faults to appear in his work for the sake of fixing his sensations in the presence of nature. "It will always be that way, and that is why I despair." And that is why, letting the limitations of his mortality take care of themselves and subordinating everything to the expression of his spiritual being, he is among the immortals.

LONDON SEES AMERICAN PAINTINGS AND SCULPTURE

By P. G. KONODY.

LONDON.

TWO American artists, a painter and a sculptor, have attracted the attention of the London public during the past month. The painter, Mrs. Leslie Cotton, is not altogether unknown to fame, as her exhibition of portraits at the Alpine Club Gallery follows upon a similar show held here not very long ago.

The sculptor, Dr. W. H. Sheldon, is a newcomer, since it is only a year or so back that he gave up his successful medical practice in New York in order to embark on his new career in Florence.

Mrs. Cotton, who works in Paris, appears to enjoy an enviable degree of popularity, if one may judge from the formidable array of distinguished sitters who have passed through her studio. At her exhibition were to be found portraits of President Millerand, Jerome Napoleon Bonaparte, Prince Christopher of Greece, the Marquise de Taillerand, Countess Bernsdorf, Lady Abdy, Lord Robert Innes-Kerr, Lady Diana Cooper, Princess Villa Rosa, the Marquis de Castellan, Prince Youssoupoff, the Marquesa Casati and many more personages of note.

This painter's popularity has a sound basis, for her portraits combine such abstract artistic qualities as effective and infinitely varied design and daringly unconventional arrangements of color, with strong characterization and a likeness that never fails to be convincing. Her concern with the artistic problem never makes her obtrude her own personality or offend the sitter's susceptibilities.

To maintain this balance requires a good deal of tact and frequently necessitates a certain degree of compromise. The artist who works to please a sitter is never quite a free agent. It is perhaps for this reason that Mrs. Cotton is at her very best when she is untrammeled by any such considerations, as in her portraits of Japanese actors in costume or in pictures painted from professional models. Her full-length portrait of the Abbé Meugnier in his black soutane, with a face expressive at once of keen intelligence and of profound kindliness, is carried out in the same spirit as are these pictures of models. It is safe to hazard the guess that it was painted for the artist's own pleasure.

DR. SHELDON, who is showing some twoscore statuettes, groups and works in clay, plaster and bronze at the Fine Art Society's Galleries, lives in Florence, surrounded by the masterpieces of Michelangelo, Donatello and the other giants of the Renaissance. He is led by his ambition to the use of the human form for allegorical interpretation. But, unfortunately, his interest in anatomy for its own sake on the one hand and in the literary idea on the other is apt to make him blind to the real significance of the lessons taught by the masters.

He is a good craftsman, a modeler of great ability, but not a sculptor. Indeed, his work serves to show the gulf that separates correct anatomy from true sculpture. His work lacks monumental stability and repose; and although he models all muscles and bony protuberances in realistic fashion he disregards those plastic relations of plane to plane, form to form, which are of the very essence of the sculptor's art.

Work by Mrs. Leslie Cotton and Dr. Sheldon —Royal Society of Portrait Painters

Kineton Parkes, who is responsible for the eulogistic preface to the catalogue, says that Dr. Sheldon "set to work to construct instead of to dissect * * *; to cut away the inessentials of a block of alabaster or stone in order to give birth to the work of art lying hidden within." But this is exactly what Dr. Sheldon does not do. His treatment of the human figure suggests the anatomist's scalpel rather than the sculptor's chisel; and far from liberating the human form that lies hidden within the block he builds up the figure in clay and forces the final material into the prescribed shapes.

No doubt Dr. Sheldon will eventually moderate his restless energy and overemphasis of movement and muscular development. The path of progress in modern sculpture is by way of the study of archaic art, which teaches the important lessons of architectonic stability and synthetic simplification.

THE Royal Society of Portrait Painters occupies more than half of the spacious galleries of the Royal Academy at Burlington House. The exhibition contains "specimens" of the work of hundreds of contemporary practitioners, interspersed with a score or so of portraits with a claim to be considered as serious works of art, and a few chosen examples of portraiture by the great Victorians. It must be confessed that few of the living portrait painters can hold their own beside the exquisite quiet distinction of Orchardson's "Lord Swaythling," the Venetian sumptuousness and stateliness of Watts's "Penelope Bentinck," the straightforward, sturdy vigor of Frank Holl's "The Last Duke of Cleveland," though Sir William Orpen, Harold Knight, Gerald Kelly, Francis Dodd and Ambrose McEvoy prove themselves worthy champions of the art of our own age.

Of the bulk of the contemporary work it may be said that it is inspired by a curious kind of vanity which induces the artist to assert his personality at the expense of that of the sitter. To a certain degree this was, of course, done by the great portrait painters of all ages; but they had a personality that was worth expressing—which is more than can be said of the rank and file of modern portrait painters.

Complete suppression of his own personality in the tradition derived from the English eighteenth century is the virtue of a very remarkable portrait of "Arthur, First Duke of Wellington"—the Iron Duke—by the late Henry Weigall. It is remarkable not only as an extraordinary achievement by an artist who was barely 19 years of age when he produced this thoroughly competent and sound piece of work, but also as a link connecting the eighteenth century with the twentieth.

WATER COLORS

Works of Distinction in This Medium on Exhibition

A GROUP of painters in water color exhibit this month at the Kraushaar Galleries. Diverse in the extreme in technical approach, vision, subject-matter, they are united by their candor of spirit. Spoken of an artist, this may be as subtly derogatory as to draw attention to the fact that a man is a gentleman; but after a considerable experience of more or less conscious pose in exhibition art, such general candor among fourteen or fifteen painters handling a particularly tricky medium seems to call for mention.

Maurice Prendergast, who died not many years ago, is represented by several examples in his characteristic style, at once suave and vigorous, at once classic and personal. Sienna and Venice are among the subjects, devoted cities that have trotted to the model stand for their portraits as often as Presidents and Kings. How refreshingly Prendergast discards all the hackneyed flattery of emphasis upon their historic charms.

Sienna in a dripping rain, Venice with gay umbrellas ready for sun or shower, sweet blurs of gentle color that proves not to be so gentle as one gradually realizes its effect upon the mind. The reds are resonant, the muffled blues clang softly yet with carrying power. In Prendergast we lost a great painter. Certainly one who stooped to no flattery either of subject or public, and, most important of all, to no flattery of self.

William Zorach in this exhibition wields his strength stoutly, more stoutly than when he deals with wood and stone. His "Winter Landscape: Maine," is a splendid little evocation of a region that knows no compromises. In "Yacht at Anchor" there is the suggestion of formidable energy in the way spar and rigging are tossed to their places, without fumbling or patient particularity. Walkowitz, adjoining on the gallery wall, is less integral. In one of his shore scenes he divides his picture into two parts; forthright in one, tender and reticent in the other. But he faces the problem of drawing in pure wash on coarse paper and making his medium whisper of all sensitive joys and faint memories of little towns asleep beside an ocean.

Architectural Framework.

Charles Lay exhibits three things, of which the "Portrait" says most of the artist's intention to be himself, uncajoled and uncajoling. The composition is admirably built up on an architectural framework of design, a little internal war of conflicting accents counting hardly at all as subtracting from its general importance. The importance lies chiefly in the beautiful spacing, but the determination toward frank expression adds to it.

Henry Schnakenberg goes to water-color painting in a spirit soothing to the person who asks of a picture his money's worth. Whoever can tell what his money really is worth is a question. But he knows that he wishes nothing to be scamped, that he must see plenty of color and a well-filled ground. Nothing thin or bare. Nothing left to the imagination—he knows where he would be in that case. Henry Schnakenberg by some miracle of talent rather than tact manages pictures that admirably would satisfy this person and that also greatly please other persons who ask from a picture only a convincing expression of the artist's own idea.

Ernest Fiene's simplicity is more synthetic and grim. His observing eye is that of the fictional detective, taking in everything, and, again like the detective, he keeps most of what he sees to himself. You may guess it but you cannot say that he told you. In the end, however, his picture gives you the sum of his observations; and you are certain that he is certain.

Guy Pene Du Bois and his double are here again—the Du Bois who works with a monumental breadth, doing a Pont du Jour as it might have been done in the spacious days of Piranesi, yet emphasizing its modernity by the stiff, modern elegance of the two figures in its shadow; the double, ignoring all but the human form diabolic and breathing the good thick air of the French café into his unearthly puppets.

Jerome Myers, as usual, is at his best in water color. The gay "Balloons" is light and fresh in its gayety, without the hint of labor in technical perfection occasionally felt in the lacquered surfaces of his paintings in oil color.

Gifford Beal's forcible craftsmanship loosens pleasantly in this medium. To become muscle-bound in painting often implies a sense of responsibility too heavy for the artist to carry with a buoyant ease. With Mr. Beal this sense of responsibility now and then shows itself in a stiffening of his attack upon his subject when he uses the oil medium. How absurd it will sound to those who measure by size and appraise by weight if we say that one or two of these water colors are the real masterpieces of his authoritative art.

ART AT CORNELL

THE College of Architecture of Cornell University opened its new art gallery with an exhibit of paintings and etchings of eminent American and foreign artists. This is the first of a series of exhibits planned, each to remain on display for about a month. The twenty-one paintings are shown through the courtesy of the Grand Central Art Gallery and the twenty-six etchings were lent by the F. H. Bressler Company of Milwaukee.

BETROTHAL ANNOUNCEMENTS MADE

Engagements of Misses Adele and Alice Hammond Are of Special Note to Society Here and in England as Well

It is quite unusual for the engagements of two sisters to be announced simultaneously, and those of the daughters of Mr. and Mrs. John Henry Hammond are of more than usual interest to society here as well as in Europe. Their second daughter, Miss Adele S. Hammond, is engaged to John K. Olyphant of this city, and their third daughter, Miss Alice F. Hammond, to George Arthur Victor Duckworth of Orchardleigh Park, Somerset, England.

Miss Adele S. Hammond, who was introduced to society several years ago, was graduated from the Spence School and later attended Barnard College. She is a member of the Junior League and one of the managers of the Rehearsal Club. Her sister, Miss Alice F. Hammond, also attended the Spence School and Miss Porter's School in Farmington, Conn. She was introduced to society three years ago.

On the paternal side the Misses Hammond are granddaughters of the late General John Henry Hammond, who was on the staff of General Sherman. Through their mother, who was Miss Emily Vanderbilt Sloane, they are granddaughters of the late William Douglas Sloane and the present Mrs. Henry White. They are great-granddaughters of the late William H. Vanderbilt and fifth in descent from Commodore Cornelius Vanderbilt, founder of that family in this country.

Mr. Olyphant is the son of Mrs. J. Kensett Olyphant of 383 Park Avenue, and the late Mr. Olyphant, and a grandson of Robert Olyphant. His mother comes of an old Philadelphia family. He was graduated from Harvard University in 1918 and is a member of the Harvard and Racquet and Tennis Clubs.

Mr. Duckworth is the elder son and heir of Major Arthur Campbell Duckworth and a grandson of Colonel Herbert Davies-Evans of Highmead, Lord Lieutenant of Cardiganshire. His grandfather was the Rev. William Arthur Duckworth, Lord of the Manors of Orchardleigh, Lullington, Frome and Buckland Denham in Somerset and of Over Darwen in Lancashire. His grandmother was the former Hon. Edina Campbell, daughter of Lord Chancellor Campbell.

The Duckworths are an old Lancashire family, owners of the manor house and lands of Musbury from 1538 to the present day. For the last four generations they have lived in Somerset. Among their ancestors are numbered the Plantagenets and eleven other families who appear in Shakespeare's historical plays.

ANOTHER engagement of wide interest to society here and in Europe is that of Mrs. Marie Manice Edgar, widow of Newbold Le Roy Edgar, to Count Mercati of Greece. The marriage will take place in Paris within a few days and soon afterward the Count and his bride will sail for America. They will remain in this country during the Winter.

Mrs. Edgar, who for many years has been a prominent member of society, since the death of Mr. Edgar, about three years ago, has passed much of her time in France. For several years she has had an apartment at 30 Rue Lubeck, but recently purchased a home in the Rue de la Faisanderie. Mrs. Edgar is Chairman of the Board of Directors of the Lafayette Memorial and during the World War was a member of the Allied Relief Committee.

A church organ at Petit Andely, Normandy, built in 1620, was recently restored by Mrs. Edgar, and for her work in France President Doumergue last July bestowed the Cross of the Legion of Honor on her.

Mrs. Edgar is a daughter of the late William de Forest Manice, who had extensive land holdings in New York. For many years his home was at 4 West Fortieth Street. His former country home in Queens, L. I., is now the site of the Turf and Field Club. Part of the property occupied by the Belmont race track was owned by Mr. Manice. Mrs. Edgar is a sister of Mrs. Henry Martyn Alexander of 15 East Thirty-sixth Street and Tuxedo Park, where she also has a home, to which she and the Count will go on their arrival in this country.

THE marriage of Miss Eleanor Marquand and George Howard Forsyth Jr., whose engagement was announced last week, will unite two families whose sons have been Princeton graduates for several generations. Miss Marquand is a daughter of Mrs. Allan Marquand and the late Professor Marquand of Princeton, who was recognized as the dean of American archaeologists. He was largely responsible for the founding and developing of the Princeton School of Art and Archaeology. Miss Marquand was graduated from Bryn Mawr College and is Corresponding Secretary of the Alumnae Association. She has traveled extensively in Europe and the Near East. She is a granddaughter of the late Mr. and Mrs. Henry G. Marquand of New York and of Mrs. R. James Cross, now of Princeton, and the late Mr. Cross of this city. Mr. Forsyth, who is a son of Mr. and Mrs. George H. Forsyth of Burlingame, Cal., is a grandson of Mr. and Mrs. Henry Hazlitt of Chicago. He was graduated with honors from Princeton University in 1923.

WHILE no date has been set, the marriage of Miss Mildred Taylor and C. Beverly Davison Jr., whose engagement was announced last week, will be an event of April. Miss Taylor is the youngest daughter of Mr. and Mrs. James Blackstone Taylor of 521 Park Avenue and Sunset House, Oyster Bay, L. I. She is the sister of Mrs. Berwick B. Lanier, the former Miss Priscilla Taylor, and of James Blackstone Taylor Jr., who married Miss Aileen Sedgwick.

FESTIVAL OF DOLLS TO BE HELD

Committee of Debutantes Wearing Japanese Costumes Will Assist at Program on Saturday

THE setting for the Festival of Dolls on Saturday at the Plaza will be a reproduction of the "Hina Matsuri," or festival of dolls, in Japan. "Hina Matsuri" is one of the most attractive of Japan's national festivals. It is held for three days beginning on March 3. At this time Japanese girls, dressed in their best clothes and seated in state, serve father, mother, brothers and friends. They also visit each other, carrying as gifts presents that are all made in miniature. The festival in New York is being held this month as a farewell party to the dolls that are being sent to Japan to arrive in time for their festival. Each doll bears a message of friendship to a child in Japan.

Mrs. Winchester Fitch, who has charge of the arrangements, announces that as far as possible a street scene in Japan will be the setting for the American festival. Assisting Mrs. Fitch are Mrs. Frank Heyward, Mrs. Herbert Wylie and Mrs. Hoxie Clark. Miss Anita Browne, an artist and the Vice President of the League of American Penwomen, has charge of the decorations, and Miss Alice Bowker has charge of costumes.

A débutante committee in costume, headed by Miss Margaret Hatch, will serve tea with rice cakes during the exhibition. They are the Misses Louisa Jay, Elsie Barber, Constance Fox, Lydia Look, Helen Coley, Grace Hays and Narcissa Vanderlip.

Mrs. Ernest Thompson Seton is Chairman of the exhibit and the Vice Chairman is Mrs. Henry Clark Coe. Mrs. John J. Watson has charge of programs and Mrs. William Henry Hays of the tea.

A chain of "cutting-out" parties has been organized in connection with the festival under the chairmanship of Mrs. James C. Fargo. Assisting her are Miss Dorothy Brown, Miss Rosamond Fuller and Mrs. David Houghtaling.

The object of these parties is to increase the circle of interest in the friendship dolls that are being sent to Japan. Six or eight children meet at a "cutting-out" party and with the help of members of the committee completely dress one doll. Each guest in turn gives a party, making a chain of parties.

Information about a "cutting-out" party may be obtained from Mrs. Frank A. Vanderlip, 912 Fifth Avenue, or Mrs. Edward C. Smith, 435 East Fifty-first Street.

LEAGUE PREPARES REVUE

Juniors Are Rehearsing for Ali Baba Ball to Be Given for Charity on Jan. 14

PREPARATIONS are under way by the members of the Junior League for the Ali Baba Ball, which is to be their offering on Jan. 14 at the Hotel Astor in behalf of the Baby Shelter, which is supported by the organization. While there will be numerous suggestions of the Arabian Nights, there will be buck and wing dances and other more modern entertainment by members of the league.

In keeping with the plot of the revue there will be donkey boys, fan bearers and nautch dancers, who will wear all, or at least a great part, of Ali Babe's booty in the shape of jewels. The Forty Thieves also will play an important part in the entertainment, which is being rehearsed by Miss Lila Stewart, and with all that is to be offered there should be satisfactory financial results which will be used for the upkeep of the shelter.

This branch of philanthropy, supported by the Junior League, in the admission of babies to its care receives them without regard to race, creed or color. Various agencies in the city send one child each and, all told, during the past year the shelter has given 1,825 days of care to infants in the shelter. There also are several available homes in which infants can receive attention when the shelter is filled.

Officers of the Junior League for the ensuing year are: Mrs. Charles S. Brown Jr., President; Mrs. George S. Franklin, Vice President; Mrs. Frank P. Shepard, Secretary, and Mrs. E. Lloyd Sanderson, Treasurer.

The Board of Managers includes Mrs. Hamilton Fish Armstrong, Miss Rosalind Barnum, Miss Katherine Boston, Mrs. Lewis L. Delafield Jr., Mrs. John M. Franklin, Mrs. Sherman P. Haight, Mrs. Stafford Hendrix, Mrs. J. Horton Ijams, Mrs. Oliver B. James, Mrs. Christopher LaFarge, Mrs. William B. Olmsted Jr., Mrs. John De Witt Peltz, Mrs. John G. Quinby Jr., Mrs. Archibald M. Richards, Miss Katherine Rogers, Mrs. Roger Tuckerman, Mrs. Charles Fuller, Miss Louise Iselin, Mrs. Morris Hadley and Mrs. Fenton Taylor.

Reservations for tables, which will be placed about the ballroom of the Hotel Astor, may be made at the Junior League Club, 133 East Sixty-first Street.

COLLEGE HOCKEY TO HELP CHARITY

THE first of the season's intercollegiate hockey matches when Princeton meets Toronto on Dec. 27 in Madison Square Garden will be played for the benefit of St. Timothy's League, Inc.

The league, which is composed largely of graduates of St. Timothy's School in Cantonsville, Md., contributes each year to the American Red Cross, the Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor, the Visiting Nurse Service of the Henry Street Settlement, the Maternity Centre and the Laura Spelman Foundation, besides being a component part of the East Harlem Nursing and Health Demonstration.

Boxes have been taken by Mrs. John Clark Brennon, Mrs. James J. Higginson, Mrs. Henry G. Bartol, Mr. Howard V. Starr, Mrs. R. Penn Smith Jr., Mrs. Paul Degener, Mrs. John Riker, Mrs. Arthur O. Choate, Mrs. Eustis Payne, Mrs. Louis Shipman, Mrs. Edward S. Symington, Mrs. Morgan Jopling, Mrs. Frederick Godley and Mrs. Stephen C. Clark.

Among the patronesses are Mrs. Kurnall Babbitt, Mrs. Henry G. Bartol, Miss Zelina Clark, Mrs. Frederick DeVeau, Mrs. John Farr, Mrs. John H. Hammond, Mrs. Abbott H. Harris, Mrs. Bayard C. Hoppin, Mrs. John C. Jay, Mrs. William Adams Kissam, Mrs. William Henry McDoel, Mrs. Frank H. Potter, Mrs. William Ross Proctor, Mrs. John J. Riker, Mrs. Charles Lawrence Riker, Mrs. James R. Strong, Mrs. James B. Taylor and Miss Lucille Thornton.

Mrs. Charles J. Nourse Jr. is President of the league, Mrs. Stephen C. Clarke, First Vice President; Mrs. O'Donnell Iselin, Second Vice President; Miss Anstiss De Veau, Secretary, and Mrs. George Clinton Mackenzie, Treasurer. The directors include Mrs. Jarvis Cromwell, Mrs. Paul A. Degener, Miss Lois Worrall, Miss Emeline Starr and Miss Rosamund Fuller.

Seats, ranging in price from $3.50 to $2.50 and boxes at $30, may be obtained from Miss Rosamond Fuller, 654 Madison Avenue. Assisting Miss Fuller are the Misses Maitland Belknap and Emeline and Rosamond Starr.

ARCHITECTS PREPARE FOR ANNUAL BALL

PREPARATIONS are under way by the Beaux Arts Society of Architects for their annual ball, which is to be held in the ballroom suite of the Hotel Astor on the night of Jan. 28. The net receipts will be used for the scholarship fund of the society.

For the first time since these balls have been a feature of the Winter season a truly American plan has been decided on for the locale of the ball. It will be called "A Fête in Old New Orleans, 1800." Historical works concerning New Orleans during the days of Spanish and French control of Louisiana are being studied, and there are in hand many documents as well that will be of great assistance in designing the setting for the ball.

Whitney Warren has in charge the sale of boxes, which will be allotted to friends of the organization. Already many have been placed. Others interested are James Monroe Hewlett, James Reynolds, Chester Aldrich, Arthur Ware, John D. Boyd, George S. Chappell, Harry Allen Jacobs and Howard Greenley.

SONG RECITAL BY MARY GARDEN

THE music room at James Speyer's house at 1,058 Fifth Avenue will be filled this afternoon by many friends who are interested in the work of the New York Women's League for Animals, in whose behalf Mary Garden is giving a recital. Miss Garden was a friend of the late Mrs. Speyer, in whose memory was built the Ellin Prince Speyer Hospital for Animals in Lafayette Street, and her interest in the work of the hospital has continued for years. Miss Garden will be heard in a program that will include Faure's "Les Berceaux," Massenet's "Ouvre Tes Yeux Bleus," Granados's "Danse Espagnole," several songs by Debussy, "My Ship and I" and "The Swing," by Raynaldo Hahn, some songs by Russian composers and one operatic aria, "Depuis le Jour," from Charpentier's "Louise." Jean Dansereau of Nice will be at the piano.

The capacity of the music room will be tested, as all seats have already been sold. Mrs. Lewis Gouverneur Morris, Mrs. Reginald de Koven, Mrs. Albert Zabriskie Gray, Miss Rose Grosvenor and Miss Marie La Montagne have been aiding in the sale of seats.

PARTIES FOR DEBS ARE TO CONTINUE

Luncheons, Dinners and Dances of This Week Will Culminate In Saturday's Events for New Members of Society

DEBUTANTES are apparently conserving their energies for the strenuous week beginning Dec. 20, when there will be an almost ceaseless round of parties that have been arranged in view of the holiday season. There will be dances each night, and sometimes several of them, either for the juniors or their elder brothers and sisters. Such conditions will continue until after the beginning of the New Year.

To introduce their daughter, Miss Iris Sellar, her parents, Mr. and Mrs. Norrie Sellar, have decided on something novel, and on Tuesday they are to give on board the Berengaria of the Cunard Line a luncheon party that will include many of the other débutantes of the season. Miss Sellar, who already has been at the majority of parties for débutantes, is a granddaughter by his first marriage of the late W. Watts Sherman of Newport and she is a grandniece of the late George Peabody Wetmore. Mr. and Mrs. Sellar have of late been living in Hewlett, L. I.

AMONG the few dances of the week will be that on Friday night which Mr. and Mrs. Robert Brewster are giving in the main ballroom suite of the Ritz-Carlton to introduce their daughter, Miss Sylvia Brewster. One of the dinners preceding this dance will be given by Mr. and Mrs. Everett Colby at Pierre's for their daughters, the Misses Edith and Anne Colby, the latter being a débutante of the Winter. Mr. and Mrs. Hamilton Fish Armstrong, at Sherry's, will give a dinner for Mrs. Francis Taylor and the Misses Beatrice and Phyllis Byrne, who are her sisters. Mrs. Taylor is the former Miss Sheila Byrne, whose marriage to Mr. Taylor, son of Mr. and Mrs. Moses Taylor of Annandale Farm, Mount Kisco, N. Y., took place in Paris a year ago last October. Dr. and Mrs. Seth M. Milliken are giving a dance on Friday night at their home, 951 Madison Avenue, for their débutante niece, Miss Eleanor Boardman, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Richard M. Boardman.

THE week will end with varied festivities, as on Saturday night there will be several dances. One of them will be given at the Ritz-Carlton by Mr. and Mrs. Walter S. Gurnee to introduce their second daughter, Miss Cordelia Gurnee. There will be at the same place that night a dinner with dancing for Miss Emilie Bruce Merriman, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. E. Bruce Merriman of Providence, R. I., who will be in New York for part of the Winter. Mrs. Charles Thaddeus Terry will give an afternoon reception with dancing in the ballroom of the Colony Club to introduce her daughter, Miss Beatrice Terry, who returned recently to join her mother at 4 East Eighty-eighth Street after two years passed in Europe for study. Mrs. George L. Shearer of 63 East Sixty-sixth Street will give a reception on Saturday afternoon for Miss Frances Cruger Edgerton, who, with her mother, Mrs Arnold Edgerton, has been living in Europe for seven years.

PUPPET SHOW AIDS CHILD FOUNDATION

A PUPPET show, directed by Bobby Fulton, will be given at the Lenox Hill Little Theatre, 52 East Seventy-eighth Street, on the afternoon and evening of Dec. 30, and on the afternoon of Dec. 31, as the annual benefit for the Child Education Foundation.

The Foundation was organized in 1916 with the object of studying the training of children of pre-school age. Its growth has been rapid and its activities now include a training school for teachers for children of pre-school age (including the nursery age) and children of primary grades; the Children's Home School, a day school for children under ten years, at 66 East Ninety-second Street; a Summer school at Croton, N. Y.; an Annual Parents' Forum for discussion of the home problems of childhood and a cooperative studio for children selected from the Foundation Schools throughout New York.

In addition, the Foundation sends out its representatives to organize schools in the day nurseries of New York and other cities throughout the country. It also maintains supervision of more than 240 schools already organized in the United States, and of 75 within the vicinity of New York. The work of the organization is directed by Miss Anna Eva McLin.

Mrs. Charles Noel Edge is Chairman of the committee in charge. Assisting her are Miss Cornelia Barstow, Mrs. Edward J. Byron, Miss Lettie Curtis, Dr. Laurence Dowd, Mrs. W. Barton Eddison, Mrs. Evartson Hastings, Miss Edith Jaffray, Mrs. Frederick Keppel, Mrs. Charles W. McAlpin, Mrs. Theodore F. Savage, Mrs. Charles C. Townsend, Mrs. Ralph Williams and Byrd D. Wise.

SHUT-IN SOCIETY APPEALS FOR FUNDS

THE Shut-In Society, 129 East Thirty-fourth Street, a national organization, is celebrating this year the fiftieth anniversary of its establishment and is making for the first time in its history an appeal to the public for funds.

The local officers and directors of the society are Miss Elizabeth Peters, President; Mrs. Sydney Prescott, Vice President; Mrs. C. C. Howard, Corresponding Secretary; Mrs. George Alexander Brown, Recording Secretary; Mrs. Washington L. Mann, Treasurer; Mrs. C. C. Wakefield, Assistant Treasurer; Mrs. C. Cardeza, Mrs. J. Hofford Smith, Mrs. William G. Smith, Miss Lydia Aiken, Mrs. R. C. Drakenfeld, Mrs. Emil Goldmark, Mrs. Walter Wesendonck, Miss E. A. Conran and Mrs. L. E. Dazie.

RUSSIAN BALL DANCES ARRANGED

Contests Will Be Special Feature of Events to Raise Funds in Aid of Church

DANCING contests will be a special feature of the entertainment during supper at the Russian Ball to be given at the Ritz-Carlton on Jan. 10 for the benefit of the Russian Church Assistance Fund. The Débutante Committee, headed by Miss Rachel Hammond, is actively engaged in selling tickets for these contests. A ticket of admission will be required for each separate contest. The tickets are to be $1 for each couple. Miss Nancy Yuille, Chairman of the Entertainment Committee, is also planning a lucky number contest during the evening.

During the ball members of the Débutante Committee will sell large artificial flowers made in the colors of the imperial Russian flag. The committee includes the Misses Claire Birge, Ellen Comly, Anne Colby, Constance Fox, Shirley Behr, Hope Foote, Ursula Griswold, Elinor Klapp, Eleanor Langley, Camille Miller, Polly Potter and Kathryne Wylie.

The tickets for the ball are $10, which includes supper. Tables in the first row around the dance floor of the supper room are to be $125 for a table seating six and $175 for tables of eight. The second row tables are $100 seating six and $140 seating eight. Tickets and tables may be obtained from Miss Juliana Cutting, 598 Madison Avenue.

The ball is under the patronage of Mrs. William B. Leeds (Princess Xenia), Mrs. Hamilton Fish Armstrong, Mrs. Edmund L. Baylies, Mrs. W. George Cavendish Bentinck, Mrs. James A. Burden, Mrs. Elbridge Gerry Chadwick, Miss Fanny Cottenet, Mrs. W. Bayard Cutting, Mrs. Snowden A. Fahnestock, Mrs. Marshall Field, Mrs. Haley Fiske, Princess Serge Gagarine, Mme. Olga de Golokhvastoff, Lady Granard and Mrs. Clarence L. Hay.

Also Mrs. Vincent Astor, Lady Violet Benson, Mrs. Henry W. Bull, Mrs. James Byrne, Mrs. Carroll Carstairs, Mrs. W. Murray Crane, Miss Laura F. Delano, Mrs. Newbold Le Roy Edgar, Mrs. Mansfield Ferry, Mrs. Oliver D. Filley, Mrs. E. H. Harriman and Mrs. Otto H. Kahn.

Others are Miss May Ladenburg, Mrs. John C. Livingston, Mrs. William T. Manning, Mrs. Robert H. McAdoo, Mrs. Harry T. Peters, Mrs. Whitelaw Reid, Mrs. Charles Cary Rumsey, Mrs. Cornelius Vanderbilt, Mrs. Whitney Warren, Mrs. Allen G. Wellman, Mrs. Norman O. Whitehouse, Miss Mary Hoyt Elborg and Mrs. R. Thornton Wilson.

The Hardman

Welte-Mignon

LICENSEE

Pictures of world's famous opera stars—Beautifully illustrated 48-page book, just published. Free on request. Simply write for De Luxe Edition No. 4

Combining the world's most durable piano with the world's premier reproducing device

The Louis XVI model illustrated here is one of many beautiful period cases created by our art department.

A CONCERT by famous pianists in your home at any time—an education in the finest music as played by leading artists—or a jolly good evening of dancing!

What is absolutely essential in a Reproducing Piano

THE most durable Piano—for that means perpetual beauty of tone. No other instrument receives more strenuous usage than an electrically operated reproducing piano. Choose for elegance of casing, yes, and for loveliness of tone—but be sure at the same time of an instrument that will hold its tone perfection.

The most artistic Reproducing Action—for that means fidelity of reproduction. Only Welte-Mignon Licensee possesses the secret of perfect reproduction.

Golden tone—enriched by time

The Hardman not only endures, but actually improves with time. Its round full-throated singing tone grows ever more delightfully mellow—richer, more resonant. The Hardman has that inbuilt staunchness of structure which enables it to maintain its unique tonal character in spite of the most unremitting use.

Through the Hardman Welte-Mignon Licensee the music of the world's great composers and pianists is brought into your home as they themselves would have it reproduced. In the magic of the instrument their genius lives forever—at your command.

Read in the panel at the left some of the illustrious names of artists whose compositions and whose playing are permanently recorded for you in the Welte-Mignon library. Just as the Welte-Mignon Reproducing Action represents perfect reproduction, so this Welte-Mignon library is the most comprehensive of all—the resources of its 2100 records inexhaustible.

Priceless musical wealth—from $975 to $5000

The Hardman Welte-Mignon Licensee offers you a selection unexcelled in art grand pianos and authentic period models. The Louis XVI illustrated above is just one of the many magnificent choices open to you. From our diversity of Standard and Period models, you will have no difficulty in selecting an instrument to harmonize with any home interior. Every model a true reproducing piano, electrically operated. For your enduring happiness—or a perfect and perpetual gift to one you love.

Budget Payment Plan

Come in. See them all. Sit down and play any you like. Then make your selection. Payments may be made in convenient amounts, well within your budget—and, if you wish, arrangements made for the exchange of the instrument you now have.
